The property belonged to Mr. James E. Bradshaw, who was the father of the plaintiff, and the father also of another gentleman, Mr. William Bradshaw, who is now the surviving executor of his father. The father borrowed the sum of £5,171, and the question of law that arises upon the facts in this case is whether a payment which was made within twelve years before action was made under such circumstances as to be a payment by the mortgagor within the meaning of the 8th section of the Statute of Limitations (37 & 38 Vict. c. 57) coupled as to the claim for foreclosure with the statute 7 Will. & 1 Vict. c. 28.

That question involves an examination of the circumstances under which this mortgage came into existence, and a difficulty arises by reason of the fact that all the parties that I have now mentioned had a common solicitor, Mr. Harrison, of the firm of Ingram & Harrison, who is now dead.

A very great discussion was opened before us by Mr. Terrell as to whether or not certain accounts kept by Mr. Harrison in his capacity as solicitor between the parties were or were not admissible in evidence. Those accounts were between him and the father, James Edward Bradshaw, and between him and the son, Mr. William Bradshaw, and then there were also the accounts kept with the Cust trustees. But there are certain facts that are either capable of proof by admissions or stand proved quite apart from documents kept by the solicitor, and I think that they may be shortly stated thus: There is no doubt that Mr. William Bradshaw was heavily indebted. There is no doubt that he was desirous of raising a loan of £5,000 odd, and that the machinery by which that loan was obtained was by his father raising a sum by mortgaging his estate of Fair Oak, with the Cust trustees, and by handing the money as received to his son. There is also no doubt that the mortgage was effected and interest continued to be paid upon it right down to 1892. I need not carry it beyond that. It was paid by Mr. Harrison, who, it is admitted, was the agent or the solicitor acting for the mortgagor, Mr. J. E. Bradshaw, down to his death, and who continued to act as solicitor for his executors, of whom he was one, after his death. Those facts are admitted.

But it is said, admitting those facts, there is no evidence of a payment by the mortgagor which would keep alive the obligation of the mortgagor under the Statute of Limitations.

The section primarily in question is the 8th section of the Act which I have just referred to. It is in in these terms—[His lordship read the section, and continued:]—and the section of the Act 7 Will. 4 & 1 Vict.—the whole Act consists of one section—after reciting that there were certain doubts as to how far the statute applied to mortgages and that it was expedient that those doubts should be removed—provides as follows—[His lordship read the section, and continued:] Dealing first with what I have called the uncontested facts, how does the matter stand? You have a mortgage created, you have interest paid upon it right up to a period within the Statute of Limitations by a person who is admitted to have been the solicitor to the mortgagor himself and afterwards to his executors, and you have the payment admittedly received as and for a payment under this mortgage by the mortgagees. Starting at that primâ facie case, why is the mortgagee not entitled to succeed? It seems to me that alone is sufficient to justify the mortgagee here in saying, "There has been a payment made within the statutory period on this mortgage. Therefore, though I accept that as against a person who has been in possession, as the plaintiff has here, for more than twenty years, the onus is upon me to show that that mortgage is alive; yet, accepting it, I prove by admissions or aliunde"—and the facts which I have mentioned are uncontested—"a continuous payment of interest by a person who, primâ facie, is the proper person to pay it to persons who have received it under the mortgage." It seems to me that that throws the onus of proof on the persons who say that the mortgage has ceased to exist; that is, on the plaintiff here. The question then would be whether he has discharged that onus which has been thrown back upon him by showing that these payments were made under such circumstances as not to be payments by the mortgagor within the meaning of the section.

If the case rested there and if Mr. Terrell succeeded in the very vehement argument which he has addressed to us with a view to excluding the accounts kept by the solicitor, it seems to me that Mr. Terrell would have no answer to this case at all, because he elected not to call the person now living who knows most about this matter—viz., Mr. William Bradshaw, the son. Having deliberately elected not to do that, he comes before us and objects strenuously to the admission of the accounts kept by Mr. Harrison which purport to show the whole history of the financial dealings between these parties, the father, James E. Bradshaw, the son, Mr. William Bradshaw, and himself. It seems to me that Mr. Terrell cannot really advance a step in this case without going into those accounts. Therefore I think that though this decision might be rested, and firmly rested, quite apart from anything in those accounts, which were specially dealt with by the learned judge below, yet as Mr. Terrell, though trying to keep them out, has relied himself upon some of the facts which appear in them, I think it will be better on the whole to deal with them. Dealing with them involves a slight consideration, but I think a cursory consideration will be enough of the question how far they really are admissible. With respect to that question it seems to me that Mr. Terrell is really not in a position before us to raise the question as a matter of strict law whether these documents are admissible or not, because at the trial Mr. Astbury was there with the evidence which would have told us the precise conditions under which these documents came into existence. Owing to what passed between him and Mr. Terrell in the presence of the judge at the time that evidence was not called, and having regard to the nature of the admissions interchanged, and Mr. Terrell's very pronounced admission to us as to what was in his own mind at the time, and to the attitude of the judge, and to the absence of any note regarding any objection either in the note handed to us or in his lordship's judgment—which is a very careful judgment—to the complete absence of any reference to this point, it is obvious to me that the explanation of what took place before the learned judge was this: That Mr. Terrell had not in his mind at the time the technical difficulties which arose as to the admissibility of an entry made by a deceased person, but that he was of opinion that these entries were really res inter alios acta, and did not bear directly upon his position, and were not admissible in evidence as between parties. He had that in his mind. I do not think that there were present to his mind the technical grounds upon which statements made by a deceased person are or are not capable of being received at all in evidence. I think that his view was that if these entries were allowed they really were not evidence against his clients, and that they were irrelevant. He certainly did not bring it to the learned judge's mind—in fact, I understood him to admit this himself—that he thought that there were technical objections as to the reading of these entries at all. If those objections had been pressed Mr. Astbury had witnesses who were prepared to deal with them, and I do not think that we should be justified now in excluding that evidence on the ground that these technical conditions had not been made good if it were possible that they could have been made good by Mr. Astbury by calling witnesses. One objection pressed upon us by Mr. Terrell was that as to the class of entries of which it was asserted that they were entries made in the course of the discharge of duty, they must not only be made in course of duty, but they must be made at the time. Mr. Astbury's witnesses could have described how these entries came into existence and when they were made. He certainly cannot deal with an objection based on this ground, where the witness, after discussion, was not put into the box because he was not wanted.

There is a further observation to be made upon that. If this case had been seriously argued on the ground upon which Mr. Terrell argued it before us, and if the learned judge had been disposed to take his view of it, it was competent for Mr. Astbury there and then to call from the hostile camp the gentleman who knows most about it, but who—I have no doubt for very good reasons—thought it desirable not to go into the box, and that is Mr. William Bradshaw. We could not put Mr. Astbury's clients back into the position in which they were at the time, and Mr. Terrell cannot rely on the technical objections as to these documents, though I must say, after hearing the argument, that I am not disposed to attach very great weight to them. So that I do not think that the question is now open to us any more than it was before the learned judge before whom it was never raised, and whose opinion upon it we have not got.

Having said that much, I propose now to refer to one document which is outside any of the principles urged by Mr. Terrell—that is, the extract from the bill book kept by Mr. Harrison, which bears an entry: "Received on account costs of loan, the 24th of November, 1879, £150." That is a clear entry against interest as to which I do not think it can be contended that it did not make this bill admissible in evidence. But when you get this bill in evidence it really tells the whole transaction out of which this mortgage arose, because it shows that the object of raising the money was Mr. William Bradshaw, his father becoming the nominal debtor and mortgagor between him and the Cust trustee, but between him and his son raising the money for his son, the son undertaking the obligation of paying the interest upon the mortgage.

I need not go through these entries in detail, but that is to me the fair and inevitable inference to be drawn from them. The money was borrowed for the purposes of the son, and was borrowed by the machinery of the father giving a mortgage upon his own property. We know—in fact it is admitted—that the payment of interest was made by Harrison throughout and by the executors, Harrison and William, after the death of the testator. If that money was paid by the person William, who had come under that obligation which is evidenced by that bill, how can that be said to be a payment not by the mortgagor? It is a payment which was made under the obligation imposed by the bargain between the parties that William should pay, his father being responsible directly and personally to the Cust estate, but as between himself and William, William being the real debtor and the father being the surety. If you look to the origin of the inference drawn from a payment and its effect in keeping the security alive, it must be a payment by the mortgagor—that is to say, it must be such a payment as founds the inference that the mortgagor acknowledges the security as a still subsisting security. That is the meaning of saying that the statute only runs from the time of payment. It does not say in terms in the Act that it is to be a payment by the mortgagor, but it obviously implies—and the cases have established—that it must be such a payment as will operate as an acknowledgment by the party to the contract, the mortgagor, of the subsistence of the security. After such a payment he cannot say that at the time of the payment the security did not exist. You get that acknowledgment just as much when you get an arrangement between the mortgagor and somebody else, either by a contract or by a mere mandate that that other person shall pay it for him. Whether that person who pays has the obligation imposed upon him by law as a legal agent without the assent, but still having all the rights as though he had the assent, of the mortgagor, or whether you have him appointed under some arrangement with the mortgagor himself, so long as he pays with the assent expressed or implied or imposed of the mortgagor, that seems to me to be a payment that keeps alive the liability of the mortgagor, being in point of law an admission by him of the subsistence of the security. It seems to me that you have that element exactly in this case if it is inferred as a fact, as I have no hesitation in inferring, and as Buckley, J., did infer, that the arrangement at the inception of this mortgage was that the money was borrowed for the purpose of the son, and that as between the father and the son, the son was the real principal debtor and the father the surety. To follow out this transaction and looking at these entries as in, we do find that the interest continued to be paid by the son and was paid in the books apparently to the father's account down to 1886, and from that on it was paid direct to the Cust trustees so far as appears by the entries in Mr. Harrison's books. The father died in 1887, and from that on, as I said, the two executors, Mr. Harrison and Mr. William Bradshaw, continued up to 1889, at all events, to pay interest in the same way as it had been paid before.

The payment relied upon as taking this case out of the Statute of Limitations must be a payment made before 1892. I think that 1889 would be the last date. That is to say, it must be a payment after the death of the father. It was very strenuously contended by Mr. Terrell that for more than one reason that is not a payment which would be a payment by the mortgagor within the meaning of the section. The first point that he takes is that, examining the accounts which I am now treating as in—I think that they are in for the benefit of Mr. Terrell who contested them rather than for the benefit of Mr. Astbury—looking through those you find in 1884 a transaction indicated which would seem to show that the mortgage of £5,000 odd was in point of fact paid off, and that though interest continued to be paid in the same way by William, and though he admits that it was not in point of fact paid off, still this entry, taking it at the highest against him, indicates some arrangement between the father and Mr. Harrison, whereby the father understood that the mortgage either had been paid off, or that arrangements were being made to pay it off which justified him in thinking that he might, as he did, convey the estate or a part of it which was subject to this mortgage free from incumbrances to the plaintiff. Unquestionably he did convey part, and then the executors afterwards conveyed the residue to the plaintiff free from incumbrances. Though there is a primâ facie difficulty in that entry, it seems to me that it is only a primâ facie difficulty, and that though these entries are admissible, they are like every other evidence, to be simply taken for what they are worth, and they do not become absolutely unimpeachable because they are admitted in evidence, and where you know, as we do know now—looking at all these facts as we are doing—that Mr. Harrison terminated his career abruptly by suicide, and that for some period before his death he had obviously been falsifying his books, we do look with suspicion at the entries, and when they are inconsistent with other facts that cannot be disputed we must accept the inference that they are not to be relied upon. Mr. Terrell contends that if we accept these accounts at all we are bound to accept them absolutely and for all purposes and without qualification. I do not agree to that at all. They are only evidence, and they are to be weighed as every other evidence is weighed, according to the probabilities and according to the admitted facts, and where they do not agree with those or where some particular entry does not agree with them they or it must be rejected. If you take this particular entry it does not accord with the facts, because on the very date at which it is asserted that this mortgage was paid off we find on the very same date—I think on the 17th of July, 1885, that William gives a bond for a sum which embraces this very sum—that is to say, for the sum of £15,171, being £5,171 plus the £10,000 fresh loan. That is absolutely inconsistent with the notion that William supposed that that mortgage had been paid off and the interest continues to be paid in the same way as I have said right down to 1892. Therefore it seems to me that piece of evidence in fact is displaced. It is quite probable that there was some suggestion made that something of the kind should be done, and it may even be possible that Mr. Bradshaw, the father, thought that it was going to be done, at all events to such an extent as to justify him in making a conveyance to the plaintiff on the footing that these incumbrances would be paid off, but when he conveyed this estate free from incumbrances he did not deny the incumbrances. He simply as between himself and his purchaser left the obligation upon himself to keep the interest down. Though he may have supposed it was going to be paid off so as to justify him in making the conveyance that does not in the least carry the paper entry beyond this, that it is a paper entry which does not accord with the fact.

Then Mr. Terrell says, in relying on the payment by William as taking this case out of the statute, that you can only use it for that purpose upon the inference that it is done with the assent of the mortgagor, and if the mortgagor is under the impression that the mortgage is paid off, that, at any rate, gets rid of any implied assent or admission on his part that the security is still subsisting. He regarded it as at an end, and you cannot draw from the fact that William paid it an inference that the father assented to the security being thereby kept alive. But it seems to me that that point cannot be maintained in the view which I take and which Buckley, J., took of the original arrangement for the mortgage loan. You get to this, that William came under a liability to his father to pay the interest and the principal upon that mortgage as long as it subsisted. That obligation continued upon him as long as the mortgage deed subsisted, whether the father thought it subsisted or not, and the payment by him under those circumstances under the contract with his father would, it seems to me, by virtue of that contract, be a payment which would enure as a payment in relief of the mortgage on the still subsisting contract and a payment which would be taken to be made with his assent and by his authority under his contract. That contract would survive although the mortgagors were dead. Therefore it would be possible and it was indeed obligatory still upon William as between himself and the estate after the death of the mortgagor to keep alive the mortgage and to pay the interest as he did pay it, and that although his father might for some time—I do not know that the impression continued if it ever existed; I do not think that it could have continued for some years afterwards—have been under the impression at one time that the mortgage had been paid off. Therefore it seems to me that you get a payment which has all the essentials to make it an admission by the mortgagor that the mortgage still subsists.

Then Mr. Terrell takes another point. He says: "Whether these points that I have so far taken are right or wrong, where you have a payment by a person after the death of his father, and it is a payment by a person who, although he was executor, still continued to be what he was before, that person"—who, as we think, was the person for whom the money was borrowed—"retained his attitude such as it was before the death after the death, notwithstanding that he had become an executor, and no payment made by him can have any more force or effect than if he had not been executor at all." That requires some little analysis. No doubt after the father's death the position was changed to this extent, that the father was not there to be personally and ostensibly bound and taken to make the admission involved in a payment made by his son of the interest from time to time, but there were his representatives, the executors, of whom the one was the son, and Harrison, the other, who would be just as much bound as the father would be if he had been alive. They were persons who could make the admission and who could make the payment, and a fortiori if they were bound by the contract made by the testator as his representatives, they were bound by that to assent to whatever was done in carrying out that contract by the other party to it. The other difficulty arises from the fact that the other party to the contract, William, was himself executor, but it was perfectly competent, it seems to me, for William and Harrison as executors to stand in the shoes of the testator and approve of that which has been done by one of them—by William, the debtor—in implementing the bargain of the original loan.

Therefore, it seems to me that the payment by William when he was executor is exactly on the same footing as the payment by William before his father died, and has exactly the same consequences, and therefore that that was a good payment to take the case out of the statute. I do not think it is necessary to travel into any of the numerous cases that have been discussed, because I think that, on the broad principle that I have stated, this bargain clearly brings the payment by Harrison within the limits that have been put by the cases upon the right to say that a payment made by another person is a payment made by the mortgagor. There is the last case in the Privy Council, Lewin v. Wilson, which clearly covers the full position which I find as a fact was the position of these two parties, the father and the son, in relation to this mortgage.

For these reasons I think that Buckley, J., who has delivered a most admirable judgment, in which he has discussed all the authorities, is absolutely right, and really if it were not for the vigorous and interesting argument which has been addressed to us here by Mr. Terrell I should have thought it sufficient to say that I entirely agree with Buckley, J., both in his reasons and in his conclusions. I think that this appeal must be dismissed.

STIRLING, L.J.—I am of the same opinion, and I do not wish to add anything to what the Master of the Rolls has said.

COZENS-HARDY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. I only desire to say one word. The real point seems to me to be, what was the arrangement actually come to? Buckley, J., has arrived at the conclusion that the father borrowed money for William, the son, and as between the father and William, the son, William was the person liable to pay the interest. Apart from anything else it seems to me that the bill of costs to which the Master of the Rolls has alluded contains abundant evidence to satisfy that. I find there that it is a bill paid by the son. I find "Instructions for bond from you to your father to secure the amount." I find again on the 10th of October "Attended you on your calling when you executed bond to your father for the amount raised by him on mortgage." Putting together the fact that the mortgage was for an odd sum—a peculiar sum—that the bond of the same date was also precisely the same sum and that the rate of interest was the same and that there are these entries in the bill of costs, quite apart from other disputed documents, I think that it is abundantly clear that as between the father and the son, the son was bound to indemnify the father as against this mortgage obligation. That being so, although there was no contract between the mortgagee and the son, it is quite sufficient in my view that there was a contract between the mortgagor and the son which as between these parties bound and entitled the son to make the payments of interest to the mortgagee, and that being so, there has been a payment of interest which suffices to prevent the statute from running. Any other conclusion than that which has been arrived at by Buckley, J., would, I think, have placed mortgagees in a position of extreme danger. Mortgagees advance money on a mortgage—they take security, interest is paid for a very long period regularly to them and received as and for interest, and it is received by them from a solicitor who is admitted to have been solicitor for the mortgagor and for the executors after his death. It does seem to me that mortgagees are not bound to inquire into the precise relations between solicitors and their clients, but they are entitled to assume that the solicitors are doing that which is in the ordinary course of business as solicitors under those circumstances—viz., to pay for their clients the interest due on the mortgage for which those clients are liable. For all these reasons I think that the appeal ought to fail and be dismissed with costs.

CARIDAD COPPER MINING CO. (LIMITED) v. SWALLOW. (a.)

Company—Director—Remuneration—Condition precedent—Apportionment—Articles of association.

The articles of association of a company provided that the directors should be allowed to receive as remuneration for their services a certain sum per annum "to be paid at such times as they may determine."

Held, that the words "to be paid at such times as they may determine" did not merely enable the directors to apportion the remuneration for periods less than a year, but constituted a condition to the right of a director to receive any remuneration.

Appeal from the judgment of Wright, J., at the trial of an action without a jury.

The action was brought against a director of the plaintiff company for payment of certain calls.

The defendant counterclaimed for £400 as remuneration for his services as a director during two years. The only question in the appeal was that raised by the counterclaim.

Article 80 of the articles of association of the company was as follows: "The directors shall be allowed to receive as a remuneration for their services, and there shall be allowed to them out of the funds of the company from the date of the incorporation of the company the sum of £200 per annum each, with £50 per annum extra for the chairman, to be exclusive of the remuneration of any managing director, and to be paid at such times as they may determine; and they shall also be entitled to receive and be paid in like manner 5 per cent. of the net profits available for dividend in each year divisible equally amongst them."

The answer of the plaintiff company to the counterclaim was that no time had been determined by the directors for payment of remuneration under article 80, and therefore the defendant was not entitled to any remuneration.

The company was incorporated in February, 1899.

The defendant was a director from the time of the incorporation, and continued to be so, during a period of more than two years, until the time of his death, which took place after the commencement of the action. At a meeting of the board of directors held on the 28th of December, 1899, a resolution was passed with regard to the question of unpaid directors' fees to the following effect—that, in view of the fact of the company being without funds, the payment of the same should remain in abeyance for the time being.

(a.) Reported by F. G. RÜCKER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Wright, J., gave judgment for the company on the counterclaim.

The legal personal representative of the defendant appealed.

Younger, K.C., and Lowenthal, for the appellant.—The learned judge was wrong in holding that it was a condition precedent to the defendant's right to claim fees for his services as a director that a resolution should have been passed by the board fixing a time for payment. It was held in the cases of Salton v. New Beeston Cycle Co., 47 W. R. 462, [1899] 1 Ch. 775, and In re Central De Kaap Gold Mines, 69 L. J. Ch. 18, 48 W. R. Dig. 42, that directors' fees were only payable for a whole year's services, and were not apportionable. The object of introducing the words "to be paid at such times as they may determine" into the present articles was to enable the directors, if they thought fit, to apportion the fees for periods less than a year. Wright, J., has held that the meaning of the article is that the majority of the directors may, if they think fit, postpone payment of remuneration indefinitely.

They referred to the case of Nell v. Atlanta Gold and Silver Consolidated Mines, 11 Times L. R. 407.

Witt, K.C., and Montague Shearman, for the respondent company, were not called upon to argue.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—I am of opinion that the judgment of Wright, J., must be affirmed. The whole question turns on the construction of article 80 of the articles of association. It is argued that the words "and to be paid at such times as they may determine" do not constitute a condition to the right of the directors to be paid the remuneration here mentioned. I see no reason for limiting these words, or for not giving them their natural meaning. I think they do introduce a condition to the right of a director to be paid remuneration. In my opinion they were introduced for the purpose of giving the directors power to arrange and fix times for payment, either by way of anticipation or postponement, in any way which they may consider to be consistent with the interests of the company. The case of Nell v. Atlanta Gold and Silver Consolidated Mines turned on the special words of the article there in question, and does not in any way affect the present case.

ROMER and MATHEW, L.JJ., concurred.

Appeal dismissed.

Decision of Kekewich, J. ([1901] 2 Ch. 265, 49 W. R. Dig. 31), affirmed as regards the invalidity of the surrender, but reversed on the question of the rectification of the register.

This was an appeal from a decision of Kekewich, J. (reported [1901] 2 Ch. 265, 49 W. R. Dig. 31).

The facts were as follows:

The company was incorporated in 1890 with a capital of £275,000 in 25,000 £11 shares, and with the object of carrying on the business of shipowners. Article 37 of its articles of association provided that the directors might accept from any member the surrender of his shares or stock, or any part thereof, on such terms and conditions as should be agreed.

In 1893 the company was in depressed circumstances, and had suffered a loss of over £4,000 on the sale by the directors of one of its steamships before her first voyage owing to the difficulty of paying the shipbuilders. Mr. Bellerby and two other of the plaintiffs were then among the directors. The directors agreed to bear the loss above referred to by each surrendering to the company eighty-three of the shares held by him, on which shares £1 remained unpaid. The transaction was carried out and confirmed by resolutions of the board, and the certificates for the surrendered shares were cancelled and new certificates issued to the directors for the balance of their holdings. The intention was that the directors should be relieved of liability for the unpaid £1 per share.

In July, 1893, the directors executed a deed-poll declaring that they had surrendered the shares with the object of making good to the company the loss sustained by the sale of the steamship, but (without prejudice to the validity of the surrender) that they did not, nor did any of them, admit any obligation to make good the loss or any part of it.

The company had since become prosperous, and as the result of general meetings of the shareholders held in 1899 and 1900 the three surviving directors and the executors of those who had died since 1893 brought this action against the company claiming a declaration that the surrender or purported surrender of the shares and its acceptance by the company were ultra vires and inoperative, cancellation of the deed-poll, payment of back dividends since June, 1893 (which claim was abandoned), and rectification of the register by the insertion of the plaintiffs' names as holders of the surrendered shares with £10 paid up.

Kekewich, J., held that the surrender was in fact a purchase of its own shares by the company, and therefore bad; but in the exercise of his discretion declined to grant rectification of the register, holding that the justice of the case did not require it after the lapse of time and when nothing had occurred in the meantime except that the company had become prosperous instead of embarrassed.

The plaintiffs appealed from this part of his lordship's decision.

Upjohn, K.C., and Eustace Smith, for the appellants, supported Kekewich, J.'s, decision as to the invalidity of the surrender, and argued that it amounted to a purchase of shares, not a surrender, and was ultra vires of the company. [They cited on this part of the case Trevor v. Whitworth, 36 W. R. 145, 12 App. Cas. 409; Hope v. International Financial Society, 25 W. R. 203, 4 Ch. D. 327; and In re Dronfield Silkstone Coal Co., 29 W. R. 768, 17 Ch. D. 76; and referred to the Companies Act, 1877, s. 4.] They contended, however, that if this was so the appellants were still the legal owners of the shares and had a right to be restored to the register, and referred to Sichel's case, 16 W. R. 292, L. R. 3 Ch. App. 119, and General Property Investment v. Matheson, 16 Ct. Sess. Cas., 4th ser., 282.

Warrington, K.C., and H. E. Wright, for the company.—The transaction was not a permanent one, and therefore was not a reduction of unpaid capital, any more than a surrender of a fully paid up share is a reduction of paid-up capital: In re Denver Hotel Co., 41 W. R. 339, [1893] 1 Ch. 495. In the British and American, &c., Corporation v. Couper, 42 W. R. 652, [1894] A. C. 399, the House of Lords only disagreed with the Court of Appeal's view of the facts of the Denver case. The British and American case shows that the court may sanction a purchase of shares by way of a reduction of capital. The company gave up only what resulted from the surrender; they did not give up any other property or claim. The surrender is not bad ipso facto; each case must be judged on its own merits. No case has yet decided that the court is bound to treat a surrender of unpaid shares as ultra vires unless it be in the form of a purchase. As to the other part of the case, even if the surrender is void, the right of a member to be placed on the register, and the machinery by which it is to be done, are regulated by section 35 of the Companies Act, 1862, and under this, whether proceedings be by action or by motion, the court must be satisfied as to the justice of the case. Kekewich, J., was right in holding that on the statement of claim and the admitted facts the justice of the case did not require that these gentlemen should be restored to the register. Shareholders have no right to come back and ask to be restored because the company is prosperous. General Property Investment v. Matheson can be distinguished on the ground that there were other circumstances requiring rectification; it was not granted on the bare ground that the transaction was ultra vires. The plaintiffs have voluntarily taken their names off the register.

They also referred to Lord Macnaghten's speech in Trevor v. Whitworth, 12 A. C., at pp. 440-1; Teasdale's case, 22 W. R. 286, L. R. 9 Ch. App. 54; Snell's case, 18 W. R. 30, L. R. 5 Ch. Upjohn, in reply.—A shareholder's liability for unpaid capital can only be got rid of (1) by payment in full, (2) by transfer, (3) by forfeiture, or (4) by reduction of capital sanctioned by the court. The purporting surrenderor is liable till his successor is found, and to diminish the liability of a member is equivalent to a reduction of capital.

Cur. adv. vult.

May 6.—The following judgments were delivered:

COLLINS, M.R., after stating the facts, continued: Since Trevor v. Whitworth, it is clear law that a limited company cannot purchase its own shares unless it does so by way of reduction of capital with the sanction of the court (see British and American, &c., Corporation v. Couper), and cases before Trevor v. Whitworth dealing with the acquisition of their own shares by companies are now of little assistance. Is the transaction in this case a purchase of its own shares by the company? It was certainly intended by the parties to involve the release by the company to the surrenderors of the right to call up the unpaid balance of £1 on each share, and it was therefore not a gratuitous surrender. There was an exchange of real consideration between the parties, and therefore it ought, perhaps, to be described as a sale and purchase rather than as a surrender. But assuming it can properly be described as a surrender, although it involves a consideration given out of the assets of the company to the surrenderors, it remains to be considered whether there is any legal ground on which it can be taken out of Trevor v. Whitworth. It seems to me there is not. Mr. Warrington based an argument on a minute criticism of some passages in the speeches of the learned lords in Trevor v. Whitworth, in which they deal with the argument that to hold a sale bad would be to forbid forfeitures and surrenders, and point out that these differ from the case actually before them, which involved a present parting by the company with the amount actually paid up on the shares. But whether this distinction is conclusive or not, it seems to me that when closely criticized these dicta as to surrenders deal with them as a species of forfeiture, which, as the lords point out, is recognized by the Act itself, and cannot be extended to cover a transaction having none of the elements of a forfeiture. Lord Herschell says (12 App. Cas., at p. 417), that forfeiture "does not involve any payment by the company, and it presumably exonerates from future liability those who have shown themselves unable to contribute what is due from them to the capital of the company. Surrender, no doubt, stands on a different footing. But it also does not involve any payment out of the funds of the company. If the surrender were made in consideration of any such payment it would be neither more nor less than a sale, and open to the same objections." Lord Watson says (at p. 429) that surrenders "have been admitted by the courts on the principle, as I understand it, that they have practically the same effect as forfeiture, the main difference being that the one is a proceeding in invitum and the other a proceeding taken with the assent of the shareholder, who is unable to retain and pay future calls on his shares." Lord Macnaghten says (p. 438) that "there can be no objection to the surrender of shares which are liable to forfeiture. A surrender of shares in return for money paid by the company is a sale, and open to the same objections as a sale, whatever expression may be used to describe or disguise the transaction." And in the British American case, [1894] A. C., at p. 414, he says, "I cannot agree that a transaction which involves a surrender of shares as part of the consideration is anything but a purchase of shares within the meaning of the opinion of this House in Trevor v. Whitworth."

I can see no distinction in principle between returning to a shareholder a part of the paid-up capital in exchange for his shares and wiping out his liability for the uncalled up sum payable thereon. Both methods involve a reduction of the capital, which, as Lord Watson points out in Trevor v. Whitworth, 12 App. Cas., at p. 423, persons dealing with the company are entitled to rely upon as existing either as paid up or as still to be called up, and such a reduction therefore can only hold good if sanctioned under the condition prescribed. If it be objected that the shares may, in Lord Watson's language, be "reissued," and that though the liability of the surrenderor to pay the amount still at call is extinguished the liability will remain good against anyone to whom the company disposes of the share, the answer in this case is the same as that suggested by Lord Watson in the case where the money paid up on the share is returned to the shareholder. He says, at p. 424, "In the event of the company continuing to hold the shares (as in the present case) the amount paid up is permanently withdrawn from its trading capital." But further, and apart from the question of sale or trafficking in a company's own shares, I think the reasoning in the Ooregum case, [1892] A. C. 125, establishes that to release a shareholder from any part of his obligation to pay the uncalled-up balance on his share is ultra vires of the company. "It seems to me," says Lord Halsbury, at p. 133, "that the system thus created by which the shareholders' liability is to be limited by the amount unpaid upon his shares renders it impossible for the company to depart from that requirement, and by any expedient to arrange with their shareholders that they shall not be liable for the amount unpaid on the shares, although the amount of their shares has been, in accordance with the Act of Parliament, fixed at a certain sum of money. It is manifest that if the company could do so the provision in question would operate nothing. I observe on the argument it has been sought to draw a distinction between the nominal capital and the capital which is assumed to be the real capital. I can find no authority for such a distinction. The capital is fixed and certain, and every creditor of the company is entitled to look to that capital as his security," and the opinion of the other learned lords are to the same effect. The justification of forfeitures rests on the statute itself, and I think that since Trevor v. Whitworth no authority can be relied on as justifying a surrender having the effect of reducing capital which cannot be supported as a form of forfeiture. It is not necessary to refer to Eichbaum v. City of Chicago, &c., Co., decided by Stirling, L.J., on the authority of Teasdale's case, as he will deal with those cases himself. In In re Denver Hotel Co. Lindley, L.J., in supporting a surrender, relied on the fact, pressed by counsel in argument, that "the shares being fully paid up, their surrender involves no release by the company of any of its rights against the surrenderor," indicating thereby the possible importance of a release. It is not, however, necessary to consider in this case whether a surrender, even of fully paid-up shares, could be supported. I am of opinion, therefore, that Kekewich, J., was right in his decision on the principal question in the case.

On the second point, however, he has held that notwithstanding that the surrender of the shares was void as being an act ultra vires, still the application to restore the plaintiffs to the register must be treated as being made under section 35 of the Act of 1862, and that he was not satisfied of the justice of the case within that section, and therefore refused to make the order. He relied on the fact that so much time had elapsed since the surrender, and that conceivably some persons might have altered their position on the footing that the capital of the company had been reduced; and relying on Sichel's case and the dicta of Lord Macnaghten in Trevor v. Whitworth, he held that the plaintiffs showed no equity in their favour to disturb the existing state of things, and he therefore refused to rectify the register at their instance. The application in this case is not in fact made under section 35 (if anything turns on that), but is an action asserting the legal right of the plaintiffs to be on the register, on the ground that the act whereby they were removed from it was ultra vires, and therefore a nullity. Sichel's case did not relate to an act ultra vires of the company, and Lord Macnaghten in his observations on In re Dronfield, &c., Co., in Trevor v. Whitworth treated the application as made by one who had no equity to set the court in motion. Here it seems to me that in point of law the plaintiffs never ceased to be the legal owners of the shares, and therefore are not obliged to rely upon an equity to have the register rectified. Nor, on the other hand, can the company set up lapse of time or acquiescence as validating that which was in its essence incapable of being made valid, being, as Jessel, M.R., pointed out in the Dronfield case, void and not voidable only. General Property Investment Co. v. Matheson is an authority directly in point on this part of the case, unless the fact of liquidation makes a difference. An action was there brought by a liquidator to place on the register a shareholder who had sold his share to the company at their instance many years before. Lord Shand said (16 Ct. of Sess. Cas., 4th ser., at p. 291): "If the legal right of the company be clear, then it follows that the justice of the case requires that effect shall be given to that right." I think, therefore, that Kekewich, J.'s, decision on this part of the case cannot be supported, and the appeal must be allowed.

STIRLING, L.J.—I have arrived at the same conclusion on both points, though not without some doubt upon the first. I think, however, that in view of the decisions of the House of Lords in the Ooregum case and the British American case, the weight of authority must be considered to be in favour of the view that a transaction of this kind falls within the principle of Trevor v. Whitworth. Forfeiture stands on a special footing, and surrender is only justified in circumstances which would justify forfeiture. I wish to add a few remarks with reference to Eichbaum's case. That case was decided by me on the authority of Teasdale's case, which appeared to me to be precisely in point. Cozens-Hardy, L.J., has, however, pointed out during the argument of the present case (so far as I know for the first time) that the resolutions authorizing the surrender of shares in Teasdale's case were passed in 1865, before the date of the Companies Act, 1867, whereas those in Eichbaum's case were passed after that Act. I think this makes a very material difference, and that in view of it I ought not to have followed Teasdale's case in Eichbaum's case. Moreover, the two decisions of the House of Lords since 1891 (the date of the decision in Eichbaum's case) which I have above referred to, make it more difficult now than it was in 1891 to exclude such transactions from the principle of Trevor v. Whitworth. As to the second point, I think Kekewich, J., paid too much attention to the Dronfield case. All difficulties in the way of restriction of the plaintiffs to the register are in my opinion removed by the withdrawal of the claim for back dividends, and this appeal must be allowed.

COZENS-HARDY, L.J.—The transaction was no doubt perfectly honest and beneficial to the company, but as by it the company parted with some of its assets in consideration of the acquisition of the shares, it amounts to a purchase of the shares. The earlier authorities on the first question are neither consistent nor satisfactory, but Trevor v. Whitworth and Ooregum and British American cases are now the three governing authorities. The conclusion to be drawn is, in my opinion (1) that a company may forfeit shares, a right recognized by section 26 of the Companies Act, 1862, and by Table A, but that (2) it may not purchase its shares. Where shares may be forfeited they may be surrendered, but where, as here, the transaction involves a reduction of liability on the shares, it falls within the principle of Trevor v. Whitworth. It follows from the Ooregum case that a company cannot relieve a shareholder of liability on his shares, since it involves a reduction of capital, which is illegal unless sanctioned by the court. Forfeiture is a statutory, and a sole, exception.

On the second point I cannot follow Kekewich, J. If, as I think, the plantiffs are still shareholders, they ought to be on the register. No doubt their names were removed from it at their own instance, but this does not affect their right to be restored to it if, as we hold, the transaction by which they were removed was illegal and void, and in the event of a winding up they might be held liable by the liquidator. There should be no costs of the appeal.

Appeal allowed.

In re ANDREWS.
ANDREWS v. ANDREWS. (a.)

Donatio mortis causâ—Post Office Savings Bank deposit book—Certificate of Local Loans 3 per Cent. Stock—Validity.

A. was possessed of a certain sum in the Post Office Savings Bank and a sum of £50 10s. Local Loans 3 per Cent. Stock. Three days before her death, being well aware that her death was imminent, she expressed a desire that her sister should, in the event of her death, have all the money in the savings bank and the sum of £50 10s. Local Loans 3 per Cent. Stock. She accordingly delivered to her sister a desk containing the savings bank deposit book and the certificate of the Local Loans Stock, and gave her also the key of the desk.

Held, that the gift of the money in the savings bank was a proper subject for a donatio mortis causâ, and therefore valid, but that the gift of the Local Loans Stock was not, and was therefore invalid.

This was a summons taken out by the executrix of the will of Miss Amy Caroline Andrews to determine the validity of certain donationes mortis causâ made by the testatrix to her sister, Miss Anna Catherina Andrews.

It appeared that the testatrix, on the 31st of August, 1901, being then in expectation of death, expressed a desire that, in the event of her death, her sister should have all the money in the Post Office Savings Bank, including a sum which the bank had invested for her in Government Stock, and accordingly she delivered to her sister a desk containing her savings bank book and an investment certificate issued to the testatrix by the savings bank for £50 10s. Local Loans 3 per cent. Stock, and also gave her the key of the desk.

Three days after making the above gifts the testatrix died.

The substantial question related to the validity of the gift of the Local Loans Stock, it being admitted during the argument that the recent decision of Byrne, J., in In re Weston, ante, p. 294, [1902] 1 Ch. 680, was conclusive in favour of the validity of the gift of the balance at the savings bank.

The rules contained in the savings bank book provided for the receipt of deposits for investment upon certain conditions, and rule 16 enabled depositors to invest their deposits in certain descriptions of Government Stock, including Local Loans 3 per cent. Stock.

Rule 16 then proceeds as follows: "Dividends upon such stock standing in a depositor's name will be credited to his deposit account as they become due, and will be entered in his deposit book when it is received for the annual examination. They will, when credited, carry interest like cash deposits. Any depositor who may desire to invest in Government Stock must forward to the Controller of the Savings Bank Department an application on a printed form to be obtained at any Post Office Savings Bank, and the deposit book will also be required in that department, but where a deposit is made for the purpose of immediate investment the book need not be sent with the application to invest, but can be held over until the acknowledgment of the deposit is received. The investment will be at the current price of the day upon which it is made, and a certificate thereof will be sent to the depositor by post. Sales of stock will be effected at the request of the depositor made in like manner, the application being accompanied by the deposit book and investment certificate, and in such case the value of the stock at the current price of the day of sale, less commission, will be forthwith paid by warrant to the depositor at the Post Office Savings Bank most convenient to him. A depositor may transfer stock standing to the credit of his account with the Post Office Savings Bank into the Bank of England upon making application to the Savings Bank Department on a form which can be obtained at any Post Office Savings Bank, and sending with it his deposit book and investment certificate."

The testatrix's bank book contained an entry stating that the stock had been invested for the depositor. The investment certificate certified that £50 10s. Local Loans 3 per cent. Stock had been placed on the Savings Bank Investment Account of the Bank Commissioners, that the same had been credited in the Government Stock Register of the Post Office Savings Bank to Amy Caroline Andrews, and that the deposit account had been charged with the sum of £51 1s. 4d., being the price of the stock at the date of investment and commission. It also contained a note that in the event (inter alia) of the depositor desiring to sell the stock, or transfer it into his own name in the books of the Bank of England, he must forward the certificate and his deposit book, with his application, to the Controller of the Post Office Savings Bank.

H. E. Wright, for the executrix.

Lyttleton Chubb, for Miss Anna Catherina Andrews.—I submit that both the money in the bank and the Local Loans Stock are proper subjects for a donatio mortis causâ. With regard to the stock, this is in the same position for the purposes of a donatio mortis causâ, with the exception that the stock is not entered in the name of the person entitled to it. The bank book and the investment certificate together form evidence of the indebtedness of the Post Office, and of the circumstances of that indebtedness. If the stock had been invested in the name of the depositor, as it might have been under rule 16, then no doubt the delivery of the stock certificate would not have been a good donatio mortis causâ, as a transfer would then be necessary. Here there was no transfer necessary by the depositor, the transfer being made by the savings bank.

G. Cave, for a legatee in opposition to the claim, was not called upon.

(a.) Reported by C. B. CAMM, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

KEKEWICH, J., said that as regards the cash deposit at the bank, the case was covered by the decision of Byrne, J., in In re Weston, ante, p. 294, [1902] 1 Ch. 680, and he desired to express his entire concurrence with that decision. The question as to the Local Loans Stock was new. The Post Office gave facilities to depositors to invest in Government Stock. They might invest through the Post Office Savings Bank in their own names, and in that case the stock could only be released in the ordinary way. It could not be contended that that would be a good subject-matter for a donatio mortis causâ. Both principle and authority were against that contention. But in order to assist the depositors the Post Office Savings Bank did something else. Instead of purchasing so much stock in their own names, it invested the money for them; in other words, the bank acted as trustees of the stock for the depositors, and every depositor whose money was so invested had an investment certificate. After referring to the certificate issued to the testatrix, his lordship said that there was a large sum of Local Loans Stock standing in the name of the National Debt Commissioners. That would only be transferred in the ordinary way at the Bank of England, but the Commissioners had a Post Office Savings Bank account in their books, and in that account they credited the Post Office Savings Bank with the sum of £50 10s. on behalf of the depositor Amy Caroline Andrews. There was no transfer of stock; it was a mere credit in their books. If the depositor desired to realise, there must be a debit of so much as was to be transferred to her. There was no transfer, but the £50 10s. was credited to her at the current price of the day, less commission, and the result was that she was entitled to receive that amount in cash; and, if she so requested, the money would be paid to her by warrant at the Post Office Savings Bank most convenient to her. If she changed her mind, and preferred that the money should remain at the savings bank, she had to make a fresh deposit, notwithstanding that she never touched the money. The depositor could not get the money simply by asking for it, but these forms had to be gone through, and in truth it was a sale of the stock standing in the lady's name, although as a matter of fact there was no sale at the Bank of England. According to the principle of In re Dillon, 38 W. R. 369, 44 Ch. D. 76, as stated by Byrne, J., in In re Weston, ante, p. 294, [1902] 1 Ch. 680, at p. 685, the test was whether or not the document, besides acknowledging the receipt of the money, expressed the terms upon which it was held, and showed what the contract between the parties was. There was here a book in which the sum of stock was mentioned. That showed that the Post Office Savings Bank had invested the money, and the rules which were printed in the bank-book no doubt showed the terms upon which it was held. But it was not intended that that should be necessarily exhaustive. It was necessary in the present case to go a step further, and Byrne, J.'s, decision did not assist his lordship to say that this must be a proper donatio mortis causâ of the Local Loans Stock so invested. So to hold would be to push the doctrine beyond the decided cases; and although the doctrine had been extended of late years in some cases, this was a substantial step further, and he thought it was a step which ought not to be taken by a judge of first instance. His lordship accordingly decided in favour of the validity of the gift of the balance at the bank, and against the validity of the gift of the Local Loans Stock.

In re LEGH'S SETTLED ESTATES. (a.)

Settled land — Tenant for life — Capital moneys — Expenses of improvement and development of building estate — Rebuilding of mansion-house — Dry rot — Salvage — Settled Land Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 38), s. 25 — Settled Land Act, 1890 (53 & 54 Vict. c. 69), s. 13, sub-section 4.

Where the principal mansion-house on settled land had been rebuilt owing to dry-rot, and additions and improvements had at the same time been made to the house, and the gross expenses (being more than one-half the annual rental of the settled estates) had been paid by the tenant for life,

Held, on a summons by him for recoupment, that such part of the expenditure as was not in excess of one-half the annual rental of the estates was payable out of capital under the Settled Land Act, 1890, s. 13, but that no part of the excess could be allowed by way of salvage.

This was an amended and adjourned summons by the tenant for life of settled land for an order directing the trustees out of capital moneys in their hands to repay to the tenant for life (among other sums) the sum of £17,109 17s. 3d. expended by the tenant for life in rebuilding the principal mansion-house owing to its threatened destruction by dry-rot.

At the first hearing of the summons in 1900 prior to its amendment the sum asked for in respect of these expenses was only £1,260 or such further sum as might be found necessary for rebuilding and reconstructing the mansion-house, and this part of the summons stood over until the work should be completed and the total amount of expenditure upon such works ascertained. It appeared that owing to the spread of dry-rot the house was in a very bad state, and almost the whole of it had to be pulled down and rebuilt and certain additions and improvements were also carried out upon the occasion of the rebuilding. The trustees were from time to time informed of the extent and progress of the works, and there were letters from them approving what was being done, but owing to its being impossible accurately to forecast what the extent of the works would be, no scheme was laid before them.

Under the Settled Land Act, 1890, s. 13, capital money may be applied in rebuilding the principal mansion-house on the settled land provided that the sum to be so applied shall not exceed one-half of the annual rental of the settled land. The annual rental in this case was £22,153 13s. 1d., and there were capital moneys in the hands of the trustees more than sufficient to pay the sum of £17,109 17s. 3d. asked for by the summons.

KEKEWICH, J. (after stating the facts).—I am satisfied that the mansion-house was of necessity rebuilt owing to the spread of dry-rot, and a sum equal to one-half of the rental—viz., the sum of £11,076 may properly be applied out of capital moneys in recouping the tenant for life. But with regard to moneys spent in excess of such sum I cannot sanction any further payment out of

SUTTON v. ENGLISH AND COLONIAL PRODUCE CO. (LIMITED). (a.)

Company—Director—Qualification—Articles of association—Construction—Shares held "in his own right"—Bankruptcy of shareholder.

A registered holder of shares in a limited company holds the shares "in his own right" so as to qualify him for being a director under the articles of association, when he holds them in such a way that the company can safely deal with him as the owner of the shares; and where the shareholder is an undischarged bankrupt and his trustee in bankruptcy claims the shares, but has not decided whether he shall be registered or not, the company cannot safely deal with the bankrupt shareholder as owner in respect of those shares, and consequently he does not hold them in his own right for the purpose of qualifying as a director under the articles.

Dictum of Lindley, L.J., in Bainbridge v. Smith, 37 W. R. 594, 41 Ch. D. 462, followed.

Motion.

The defendant company was incorporated in November, 1901. The plaintiff was under its articles of association the first director. Article 104 was as follows: "A director must be member of the company. The qualification of a director shall be holding in his own right alone, and not jointly with any other person, 100 shares of £1 each, or £100 stock, and this qualification shall be required as well of the first directors as of all future directors."

By article 116 the office of director was to be vacated (b) if a receiving order was made against him, or (c) if he ceased to hold the qualifying number shares or amount of stock.

By article 35 a person becoming entitled to a share in consequence of the bankruptcy of a member might, upon producing evidence of his title, either be registered himself as holder or elect to have some person nominated by him registered.

The plaintiff was, and on the 25th of April, 1902, continued to be, the registered holder of 1,000 shares, numbered 6,000 to 7,000.

The plaintiff had in fact been adjudicated a bankrupt in 1888, and had never been discharged.

On the 14th of April, 1902, the trustee in bankruptcy gave the company formal notice, requiring them forthwith to place his name on the register in respect of the above-mentioned 1,000 shares.

On the 16th of April, by a telegram and letter, he modified this by stating that although he claimed the shares as property vested in him by law, he did not ask for an actual transfer for a few days, but wished to have a list of the shareholders, as he proposed to offer the shares for sale to the shareholders.

On the 25th of April, the plaintiff was excluded from the board of directors upon the ground that he had become disqualified.

On the 28th of April a transfer of 100 other shares in the company was executed in his favour, and this was lodged with the company for registration. It came before the board on the 1st of May, and the directors refused to register it.

The plaintiff brought this action against the company and two of the directors for an injunction to restrain them from excluding him from acting as a director, and for rectification of the share register by inserting his name as holder of the 100 shares transferred to him, and the plaintiff now moved in the action to the same effect.

Hansell and A. R. Macklin, for the plaintiff.—The plaintiff is the registered holder of the shares. It is true he is trustee of them for his trustee in bankruptcy, but that does not prevent his holding them "in his own right": Pulbrook v. Richmond Consolidated Mining Co., 27 W. R. 377, 9 Ch. D. 610. That case was approved of by Lindley, L J., in Bainbridge v. Smith, 37 W. R. 594, 41 Ch. D. 462, and is now settled law: see observations of Lord Herschell in Cooper v. Griffin, 40 W. R. 420, [1892] 1 Q. B. 740. The decision, however, in Cooper v. Griffin and in Howard v. Sadler, 41 W. R. 126, [1893] 1 Q. B. 1, turned upon the words of the statute 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110 As regards the 100 shares transferred to him, the plaintiff had a right to be registered as holder as his trustee had made no objection.

H. Terrell and J. Israel, for the defendants.—The views of Jessel, M.R , in Pulbrook v. Richmond Consolidated Mining Co., as to the absence of the beneficial interest not preventing shares being held "in his own right" were not necessary to the decision, as the registered holder there had the beneficial interest subject to a mortgage. Bainbridge v. Smith is an express authority that the plaintiff does not hold these shares in his own right. Cooper v. Griffin and Howard v. Sadler were also decided upod the same words in a statute, and show that the trustee of shares does not hold them in his own right. As to the 100 shares, by section 50 (5) of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, they must be deemed to be assigned to the trustee. The shares belong to the trustee and the plaintiff is not entitled to be registered.

Cur. adv. vult.

June 5.—BUCKLEY, J.—The effect of the action taken by the trustee in respect of the shares standing in the name of the plaintiff was, in my opinion, that he claimed the shares as his, but postponed for a few days his decision as to whether under article 35 he would require to be registered himself or elect to have some person nominated by him registered as transferee. Under these circumstances the question is whether, after the 14th and 16th of April, 1902, the bankrupt continued to hold "in his own right" these 1,000 shares. In Pulbrook v. Richmond Consolidated Mining Co. Jessel, M.R., held that a man may hold as registered member in his own right notwithstanding that he has not the beneficial ownership of shares. Looking at what was said by Lindley, L.J., in Bainbridge v. Smith, 37 W. R., at p. 598, 41 Ch. D., at p. 474, by Lord Herschell in Cooper v. Griffin, 40 W. R., at p. 422, [1892] 1 Q. B., at p. 750, and by Lord Coleridge and Wills, J., in Howard v. Sadler, 41 W. R. 126, [1893] 1 Q. B., at pp. 3 and 4, I think that, notwithstanding what was said by Cotton, L.J., in Bainbridge v. Smith, 37 W. R., at p. 597, 41 Ch. D., at p. 472, this decision of Sir George Jessel's cannot now be treated as open to question. It is true, as has been pointed out in some of the subsequent cases, that Pulbrook, in the case before Jessel, M.R., was beneficial owner subject to a mortgage, and that therefore the decision might be supported upon a different ground. But the ground upon which the Master of the Rolls put it, and which is supported by the later cases, is that the words "holding in his own right" do not require that the holder shall be beneficial owner. Negatively, then, the holder in his own right need not be beneficial owner. It remains to say what, affirmatively, he must be. That, I think, is answered by Lindley, L.J., in Bainbridge v. Smith 37 W. R., at p. 498, 41 Ch. D., at p. 475. He must be a person who holds shares in such a way that the company can safely deal with him in respect of his shares whatever his interest may be in the shares. Holding in a representative character will not do. Holding as trustee without beneficial ownership will do, but the holder must so hold as that the company can safely deal with him as owner. Turning, then, to the facts of this case, after the 14th and 16th of April, 1902, could this company have safely dealt with the plaintiff in respect of the shares? I think not. The company had received notice from the trustee that he claimed the shares and that he postponed for a few days stating in which way he would under article 35 avail himself of his rights of ownership. After that the company could not have safely dealt with the plaintiff in disregard of the claims of the trustee. In my judgment, therefore, the plaintiff (although he had a beneficial interest in case his estate proved to be solvent) was not on the 25th of April the holder in his own right of the 1,000 shares. He had become disqualified, and his office of director was vacated. Subsequently a transfer in his favour of 100 shares was executed and lodged for registration. The directors refused to register it, and the ground upon which they rely is that, if they had registered it, the trustee in bankruptcy would have been entitled to take the shares. This is not, I think, in the mouth of the company, any answer to a demand for registration of the transfer. It is an effectual transfer. The trustee had not raised, and I see no reason why he should raise, any objection to its registration. The right of the trustee to the shares is in no way defeated, but, on the contrary, is assisted by the company taking the shares out of the name of the transferor and putting them into the name of the transferee. Seeing, however, that the plaintiff had previously become disqualified as a director, and his office had fallen vacant, his subsequent registration as the holder of these 100 shares will not re-establish him in his office. So far, therefore, as the notice of motion asks an injunction to restrain the defendants from excluding the plaintiff from acting as director, it fails, and I dismiss it. So far as it asks for rectification by inserting the plaintiff's name as the holder of the 100 shares, Nos. 5,901 to 6,000, it succeeds, and I make an order for rectification. I make no order as to costs. To complete the review of the cases relating to holding "in his own right," I may add that the words "in his own right" for the purpose of qualification, and the same words for the purpose of a charging order under 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110, s. 14, have not the same meaning. The language of 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110, s. 14, is "standing in his name in his own right or in the name of any person in trust for him." The juxtaposition of these words shows that the shares to be charged are to be shares in which the judgment debtor has a beneficial interest. The same shares, therefore, may be held by the judgment debtor "in his own right" for purposes of qualification, but not so as to render them available for the purpose of a charging order. This was the decision in Cooper v. Griffin and Howard v. Sadler.

Company—Special resolution—Voting—Show of hands—Proxies—Chairman's declaration—Companies Act, 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 89), s. 51; Table A, art. 42.

Although a chairman's declaration is, under section 51 of the Companies Act, 1862, conclusive evidence of the carrying of a special resolution, even if founded on an error or mistake of fact, it is not conclusive if on the face of it wrong in fact and founded on a mistaken view of the law.

Creditor's petition for a compulsory winding up order.

In the course of the case a question arose as to whether a special resolution for voluntary winding up had been validly passed.

The facts were briefly as follows:

The company's articles provided (by clause 58, which was practically identical in terms with clause 42 of Table A.) that "at any general meeting, unless a poll is demanded by at least five members personally present, a declaration by the chairman that a resolution has been carried, and an entry to that effect in the book of proceedings of the company shall be sufficient evidence of the fact without proof of the number or proportion of the votes recorded in favour of or against such resolution"; and (by clause 61) "every member shall have one vote for every share held by him." The first of the two meetings for passing and confirming the special resolution for voluntary winding up was held in July, 1901. There was considerable discussion; the resolution was put to the meeting; there was a show of hands and the chairman announced "those in favour, six; those against, twenty-three, but there are two hundred voting by proxy, and I declare the resolution carried as required by Act of Parliament." No poll was held or demanded.

Gore-Browne, K.C., and Martelli, for the petitioners.

John Henderson, for the company and the alleged voluntary liquidator (upon whom the petition had been served), argued that, having regard to the articles and to section 51 of the Companies Act, 1862, the chairman's declaration could not be disputed.

BUCKLEY, J., in dealing with this point, after reading section 51 of the Companies Act, 1862, said that the respondent's contention that the chairman's declaration was conclusive seemed to involve the drawing by the court of the inference that if the chairman's declaration in giving the numbers for and against a resolution showed that there was not the necessary three-fourths majority, but nevertheless declared that the result in law was that there was the necessary majority, such declaration was conclusive; if, for instance, the chairman were to declare when the numbers only showed a bare majority that as the statute only required a bare majority, the resolution was duly passed, or were to say that he held a number of proxies and to purport to count them and thereby carry or reject the resolution (as Ernest v. Loma Gold Mines, 45 W. R. 45, 86, [1897] 1 Ch. 1, showed he could not) his declaration would, on the respondent's contention, be conclusive.

If the chairman erroneously or by mistake declared a resolution carried, the court would not go behind that declaration (In re Hadleigh Castle Gold Mines, [1900] 2 Ch. 518, 49 W. R. Dig. 28, and Arnot v. United African Lands, 49, W. R. 322, [1902] 1 Ch.

518); but these decisions had no application to a case where a chairman gave the figures rightly, but by an error as to the law wrongly declared a resolution carried, as he had done in the present case.

REX v. LICENSING JUSTICES OF FARNHAM AND OTHERS. (a.)

*Licensing Law—Justices—Refusal to renew licences—Justices themselves the objectors—Notice of objection by the justices served on licensees—Jurisdiction of same justices to hear and determine applications—Appeal entered to quarter sessions—*Mandamus—Licensing Act, 1872 (35 & 36 Vict. c. 94), s. 42, sub-section 2—Licensing Act, 1874 (37 & 38 Vict. c. 49), s. 26.

The licensing justices of F. gave notice that they intended to object to the renewal of certain licences, having themselves previously taken steps to get information as to the requirements of the division and the number of licensed houses, and on that information they considered there were too many licensed houses for the population.

The applications were made and refused. The licence-holders thereupon entered an appeal to quarter sessions, and also moved and obtained a rule nisi for a mandamus directed to the justices on the following grounds: (1) That the justices were not entitled to be objectors to the granting of the licences; (2) that if they were so entitled, and if in fact they did object, they were not entitled to sit and adjudicate on the applications; (3) that in these particular cases the justices were disqualified by reason of the steps they had taken to get information concerning the houses, and had prejudiced the case; and (4) that one of the justices was a member of the authority actively engaged in opposing the renewal of these licences, and had been party to a resolution in opposing them.

Held, discharging the rules that the justices could raise these objections under section 42 of the Licensing Act, 1872, and that the proceedings were not invalid, because the notice of objection had been given by the justices.

Held, also, that the notices of appeal to the quarter sessions were no bar to proceedings for mandamus, and conversely that the failure of the application for a mandamus did not invalidate the notice of appeal.

On the 15th of April this court had granted a rule nisi directed to the licensing justices of the Farnham Division of Surrey to show cause why a mandamus should not issue commanding them to hold an adjourned licensing meeting and to hear and determine certain applications for the renewal of licences, including one to Mrs. J. E. Smith, of the Queen-street Tavern, Farnham.

There were in all nine applications of the same nature, the facts being substantially the same in each instance. The rule was asked for on the following grounds—(1) that the justices were not entitled themselves to object to the renewal of a licence; (2) that they were not entitled to adjudicate upon their own objections; (3) that they were precluded from sitting and adjudicating by having previously collected evidence and prejudged the cases; and (4) that one of the justices (Mr. Bentall) who refused the licence was not only a member of a body which had previously resolved to oppose renewal of licences, but had been an actual party to the resolution.

(a.) Reported by ERSKINE REID, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

It appeared that some months ago the justices appointed a committee to make inquiries in Farnham with a view to reducing the number of licences; evidence or what was called evidence was collected and embodied in a report which was headed "'Private and Confidential'—Proposed Reduction of Licences in the Division." It contained tabulated particulars as to all the licensed houses. The justices held a meeting to consider this report prior to the annual licensing meeting on the 1st of March, and resolved that their clerk should obtain the presence of witnesses in support of the report. At the annual licensing meeting notice was given on behalf of a majority of the justices that they would object to the renewal of all the full licences in the district. Two justices (one being Mr. Gould, K.C.) dissented, but the clerk, nevertheless, served notices of objection, on behalf of the justices on a number of licence-holders. At the adjourned meeting on the 14th of March objection was taken, on behalf of Mrs. Smith and others, that the justices were not entitled to serve notices of objection to renewal, and that those who had taken part in so doing were disqualified from sitting in such cases; and, in particular, an objection was urged against one of the justices, who was a member of the Congregational Union, and had taken an active part in the proceedings before referred to. The justices whose conduct was impeached retired to consider the matter, and on their return overruled the objection, and the chairman conducted the case of the opposition and examined the witnesses. In the result the licences were refused.

The court granted the rule nisi as asked in each case, and the rules now came on for argument before the same judges.

F. Low, K.C., and Hohler, for the justices.—This case raises two important questions of law—(1) can justices start an opposition themselves to a licence, and (2) if they have taken any steps to oppose a licence being granted can the adjudicate upon the application? Unless the court is prepared to hold that section 42 of the Licensing Act, 1872, as amended by section 26 of the Act of 1874 has so cut down the discretion of the justices with regard to their refusing to renew licences that they are unable to use their discretion and must grant an application unless it is opposed by an objector outside their own body, the answer to the first question must be that the justices themselves may oppose a licence. As to the second question, if bias is proved the ruling of the justices is void; but there is nothing on the facts here that carry this case to that length. It was impossible to sustain the proposition that a magistrate might not object. If the objector must be a third party it would be a good answer to say because you are a magistrate the objection raised by you is invalid. Certainly the bench has a right to view the premises and to form their own opinion as to the requirements of the neighbourhood. The notices here were served on all the alehouses—there was no picking out. The affidavits of the chairman and justices showed that they considered the objection to the licences and heard evidence on oath and reserved their decision until all the cases had been heard. All the material facts which were known to the justices were given in evidence. The question is really can a magistrate formally object for the purpose of allowing himself to exercise the discretion given him by statute and then proceed to hear the application on its merits? Baxter v. Leche, 79 L. T. Rep. 138, 47 W. R. Dig. 99, really decides the point. The only authority to the contrary is the dictum of Hawkins, J., in Reg. v. Justices of Anglesea, 65 L. J. M. C. 12, 44 W. R. Dig. 89. That was the view of a single judge, and it cannot be reconciled with any decision of the Divisional Court. Moreover, here mandamus is not the proper remedy, for mandamus is not available where there is another remedy; and the parties have here a right of appeal to quarter sessions and are actually pursuing it, for they have given the justices notice of their appeal.

Avory, K.C., and Stimson, for the licensees.—Dealing with the second point first, mandamus is really the only remedy open to us, because we say that the tribunal whose decision we seek to have set aside was improperly constituted, and that under the circumstances the justices had no power to hear the applications at all. That is a question which the quarter sessions cannot decide. They must assume that the licensing justices had jurisdiction. All they can say is whether the decision they arrived at ought to stand or ought to be set aside: Reg. v. Farquhar, L. R. 9 Q. B. 258, 22 W. R. Dig. 38; Reg. v. Howard, 37 W. R. 617, 23 Q. B. D. 502; Akkersdyk v. London County Council, 40 W. R. 285, [1892] 1 Q. B. 190. Here the justices were the objectors, contrary to what was ever contemplated by section 42 of the Act of 1874, which clearly contemplated an objection made to the justices by some third party: Reg. v. Anglesea Justices. The present case is distinguishable from Baxter v. Leche. That being the question, it is nihil ad rem to discuss whether they were biassed by anything which took place, or whether they were actuated by anything but the best of motives, for all the justices who made themselves parties to the notice of opposition or had otherwise identified themselves with the opposition are disqualified.

Low, K.C., replied.

The following cases were also referred to during the argument: Reg. v. Justices of Merthyr Tydvil, 14 Q. B. D. 584, 33 W. R. Dig. 122; Reg. v. Eales, 42 L. T. Rep. 735, 28 W. R. Dig. 129; Leeson v. The General Medical Council, 38 W. R. 303, 43 Ch. D. 366; Akkersdyk v. London County Council; Boulter v. Justices of Kent, 44 W. R. 114, [1897] A. C. 556; and Allinson v. General Medical Council, 42 W. R. 289, [1894] 1 Q. B. 750.

Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J., in giving judgment, said: The rules are moved on four grounds—first, on the very important ground that justices who are members of the tribunal cannot raise the objection contemplated by section 42; secondly, if they did so, they must not adjudicate on the cases in respect of which they had given notice of objection; thirdly, that in this case the justices had obtained information on which they had acted contrary to the provisions of section 42; and, lastly, there was a special objection to one of the justices named Benthall on the ground that he had been a party to proceedings which, it was said, would invalidate his action in the judgment to which he was a party. The first and most important thing we have here to do is to try and lay down certain principles which may be deduced from the cases and then consider what are the rights of the justices and of the parties in regard to this matter, having regard to these principles.

I think it is quite clear that the justices could only act and should only act upon sworn evidence given before them, and that if in any case it appeared to the court that the justices had acted upon information obtained otherwise than from the evidence, their proceedings ought to be set aside. I think it further equally clear, not so much from the decisions as from the legislation and the general principles applicable to the set of circumstances with which the Legislature was dealing, that it would not invalidate the proceedings if the justices became acquainted with what I call the general circumstances of the case and made use of that information to bring to the minds of the persons before them the points with which they had to deal.

There is one other qualification which is most important, that if in any particular case a justice had private information with regard to that case, he ought not, in my opinion, to sit upon the case nor to do anything except go into the box and give evidence. In other words, if the case ever arose of a justice having particular knowledge with regard to a particular individual or against a particular individual or house, the knowledge could only be utilized for the purpose of the case by his giving evidence as a witness subject to cross-examination in the ordinary way. I mention these broad principles because it is only right to make it clear that I bear them in mind in expressing the opinion I have formed with regard to what the justices did.

I will state as briefly as possible, but I hope sufficiently fully, what I really understand the justices to have done: During the previous year the attention of the Farnham bench had been called to the fact that there were considered to be too large a number of licensed houses for the population of the district, and preparatory to the proceedings which had given rise to this question information was collected which would be of value for the purpose of directing the minds of any tribunal that had to deal with it to the incidents relating to the various houses. Information was collected by a committee, and the magistrates had not shrunk from stating that they did, before they sat, go round and make themselves acquainted with what would be called the surrounding circumstances of each of these houses.

It was going a great deal too far to say that, applying their general knowledge of the district to the cases they were going to sit upon, or applying the information so obtained, would invalidate the proceedings, provided that everything they intended to act upon was brought to the minds of the persons against whom it could be used.

Then they took a course to which, subject to a legal objection I will deal with in a moment, no reasonable objection could be taken. They thought it right when dealing with the suggestion of there being too many houses in the district that every house should be investigated; and certainly the justices, if the affidavits properly represented the facts (and the contrary was not suggested), did investigate individually each case but gave no decision until all the cases had been argued before them.

The principle of fairly considering all the requirements of the district and the sufficiency of each particular house no one could question.

In that state of circumstances Mr. Avory's first objection arose—a very important objection which possibly I should have taken time to consider if I did not think it was covered by authority. Mr. Avory said the justices could not either give themselves or cause any person to give on their behalf the notice contemplated by sub-section 2 of section 42. He did not of course dispute that the justices could adjourn a case on objection being made, and that they could hear the case ultimately when the owner was called upon to attend without the previously prescribed notice being given; but he said that "an objection being made" must mean made by somebody to the justices, not by the justices themselves. That proposition undoubtedly raises a very important point, which, however, was considered by Sir Henry Hawkins in the Anglesea case. At any rate there has for a long time been the view, whether judicially decided or not, that justices could raise objections to licences being renewed, and that they ought to be able to do so having regard to their functions and duties under the Licensing Acts I have myself no doubt at all. There may be many cases in which the liquor traffic could not be properly controlled unless the justices did raise such questions, but I do not found my opinion on general principles, but repeat opinions that have been expressed from time to time. In 1874 Blackburn, J., in Reg. v. Farquhar obviously thought that the justices might be able to give a notice; and when that decision was referred to in Reg. v. Merthyr Tydvil, Stephen, J., put that construction upon Blackburn, J.'s, judgment, and said it would seem to show that the objection might be made by the justices themselves. In another case, that of Reg. v. Eales, Cockburn, L.C.J., took the same view. There was, therefore, during a series of years, a considerable amount of opinion, although no actual decision to the effect that justices could raise objections. When the question came before Hawkins, J., in the Anglesea case, he certainly did use expressions which amply supported Mr. Avory's argument—expressions to the effect that in his opinion the objection must be raised by a third party. He said, "The language of the proviso, no objection being made, could only mean made to the justices." Of course that does not cover the case of an individual justice making an objection and then ceasing, so to speak, to act as a justice. It is only fair to say that the argument of Mr. Avory was well founded to this extent, that Hawkins, J.'s, opinion seemed to be that justices could not raise an objection. Then came the last case, Baxter v. Leche, in which there was a decision of Wills and Kennedy, JJ., to the effect that justices might raise an objection, and having raised it might adjourn and give notice. It is perfectly true that in that case the justices did not give the grounds on which they were going to entertain the objection, but it seemed very much fairer to those whose licence was going to be questioned that they should be told what objections were going to be raised, and therefore that particular argument seems not to affect the weight of that authority, in which I am bound to concur, as it is binding on this court. Then there is the opinion—I agree it is only an opinion, but one which contains very weighty reasoning indeed, of Fry, L.J., and all the more so because of the strong line he had taken in Leeson v. The General Medical Council, which opinion was given in a case where he was only giving his opinion after consideration as chairman of the quarter sessions, but he came to the conclusion that justices could give these notices, or, rather, raise these objections under section 42, and that it did not invalidate the proceedings that a notice had been subsequently given. Mr. Avory said, that being so, even then they must not sit and act; and that raised the really fundamental question, what was the position of the person who objected? Taking the language of Lord Herschell in Boulter's case, in the sense to be naturally gathered from his expressions, the objector was not in the position of a party, and it seemed to him, looking at the duty the magistrates had to perform and the considerations that ought to affect them, it was not right to regard a person who objected on the ground that had been raised in this case as a personal opponent of the person whose licence was being questioned, or as a party to any litigation. It was in that respect, I think, that, assuming the justices had acted without any suggestion of improper bias or of taking action on improper materials, the fact that they had given notice did not bar them from subsequently acting in the proceedings. Certainly in a case in which the real question was that the justices being of opinion that there were too many houses in the district, and the matter to be considered was how these houses were to be reduced, it would be very unfortunate that the mere fact that the notices were given so that the question might be fairly considered should prevent those gentlemen acting. Mr. Avory said if they had approached the question from the point of view of having previously made up their minds that there ought to be a reduction in the number of licences, that would be defective. I am not prepared to agree with that argument, nor prepared at present to dissent from it, but it is not applicable in this case.

As to the second point, that the justices had acted on information obtained beforehand and not given in evidence. I have seen the notes in the only case which had been argued in detail, which, it was agreed, was a typical one, and I find that all the points on which objections to the house could be founded were proved in the case of the Queen-street Tavern. All the magistrates have said that they did not act in any single case except on the evidence. And the conclusion I have come to is that it is impossible to come to the conclusion that the magistrates here acted in giving their judicial opinion on information they had obtained elsewhere. As to the question of bias, with regard to the authorities Mr. Avory has referred to, particularly the case of Akkerdyke v. The London County Council, they are all cases illustrating the principle that if a person has taken sides in a matter which he is called upon or purports to act judicially in, he cannot be allowed so to act; but in my opinion they really do not assist Mr. Avory in the view I take of the facts.

I come, therefore, to the conclusion that none of the four grounds prevail, and that this application for the rule must be discharged.

Decision of Farwell, J. (49 W. R. 476, [1901] 2 Ch. 145), reversed.

This was an appeal from a decision of Farwell, J. (reported 49 W. R. 476, [1901] 2 Ch. 145). The facts were as follows: On the 27th of August, 1872, Charlotte F. Holland, then an infant aged 18 years, married Isidore M. Bourke. She was at the date of the marriage entitled in remainder expectant on the death of the testator's widow to one-eighth of the proceeds of sale of the residuary real and personal estate of Henry Holland, who died in December, 1871, by virtue of his will made in April, 1871. No ante-nuptial settlement was executed, but a post-nuptial settlement was executed by deed dated the 8th of February, 1873, and made between the husband and wife of the first part, the testator's widow and the trustees of his will (who were the wife's guardians) of the second part, and settlement trustees of the third part. The settlement contained the following recital:

"And whereas the said parties hereto of the first part intermarried on the 27th day of August, 1872, and previously to such marriage the said Isidore M. Bourke agreed to make such settlement of the fortune of his said wife as is hereinafter contained."

Then followed a covenant by the husband with the trustees that immediately upon the share and interest of and in the residuary estate and effects of the said H. Holland—to which the husband and wife, or the husband in her right, or either of them then were or was or thereafter might become entitled—becoming an interest in possession, the husband and wife or the survivor and all other necessary parties would assign and transfer the said share to the trustees of the settlement upon the trusts thereinafter declared. These trusts were for the wife for life for her separate use without power of anticipation, and after her death, if the husband should not have been or become a bankrupt or assigned, &c., for the husband until he should become bankrupt or assign, &c., with remainder for the issue of the marriage at twenty-one or marriage in the usual way, the survivor of the husband and wife having a power of appointment amongst issue failing a joint power of appointment which was not exercised.

Mrs Bourke died on the 14th of April, 1877.

On the 25th of October, 1897, Mr. Bourke appointed two-thirds of the trust funds to two of his sons and surrendered his life interest to them; on the 1st of March, 1898, a receiving order was made against him, and on the 18th of March he was adjudicated a bankrupt. The one-eighth share of residue fell into possession on the death of the testator's widow on the 11th of December, 1899.

On a summons taken out to determine whether it was bound by the settlement or belonged to the official receiver as the husband's trustee in bankruptcy, Farwell, J., held that the settlement was void in toto against the official receiver under 13 Eliz. c. 5.

Parties interested under the settlement appealed.

W. H. Cozens-Hardy, for the trustees of the will.

Herbert Reed, K.C., and Aubrey St. John Clerke, for the appellants.—Till the husband reduces the property into possession the wife does not lose her right to it. By the covenant to settle contained in the settlement of 1873 the husband disabled himself from consenting to his wife's selling her reversion, and the husband's trustee in bankruptcy, claiming under him, is bound by the recital. Even if the covenant by him was a voluntary one, yet having entered into it he would have held the property on the trusts of the settlement if he had become possessed of it, and the burden of showing that there was no consideration for it lies on those who make the allegation. To bring the case within the statute of Elizabeth an intention to defraud must be shown. The presumption is against fraud, and the whole deed must be looked at. The evidence here negatives fraud in fact. There is no evidence that the husband had debts or that he had no other property at the date of the settlement. The recital of the agreement is a sufficient written memorandum of it: Barkworth v. Young, 5 W. R. 156, 4 Drew. 1. The defeasance clause does not vitiate the settlement as a whole, and if it is not void as a whole the trustee in bankruptcy is not entitled to the fund: In re Detmold, 37 W. R. 442, 40 Ch. D. 585.

Upjohn, K.C., and A. Adams, for the official receiver.—A settlement cannot be rendered valid against a trustee in bankruptcy by the insertion of a recital like this. If the covenant is voluntary the settlor showed a contemplation of bankruptcy such as brings the case within the statute of Elizabeth. In re Detmold, Higinbotham v. Holme, and In re Brewer were all cases of ante-nuptial settlements. The defeasance clause vitiates the whole settlement, and In re Pearson, 25 W. R. 126, 3 Ch. D. 807, lays down the true principle on this point. And notwithstanding the recital the covenant is a voluntary one of which the court would not decree specific performance: Ellison v. Ellison, 6 Ves. 656. The covenant is voluntary and unenforceable (1) because there is no evidence, binding the official receiver, of any ante-nuptial agreement at all; (2) because there is no memorandum, to satisfy the Statute of Frauds. [They cited on this point most of the cases referrred to in the judgment.] If a trustee in bankruptcy is bound by such a recital, any settlor can escape section 47 of the Bankruptcy Act by inserting it: Battersbee v. Farrington, 1 Swanst. 106. And the memorandum is insufficient, since it does not show who were the parties to the agreement, nor what was the consideration for it.

A. St. J. Clerke in reply.

Cur. adv. vult.

April 29. — The following judgments were delivered:—

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J., after stating the facts, continued: It is conceded by Mr. Clerke that the settlement rests in fieri, and cannot be enforced unless it can be supported by the consideration of marriage, and he relies on the recital of an ante-nuptial contract.

Now, as I understand the official receiver shapes his case in two ways.

First he says that the covenant is void, as being a fraudulent conveyance or alienation within the statute 13 Eliz. c. 5; secondly, he says that even assuming that the settlement is not fraudulent within the statute, yet the settlement is a voluntary settlement resting in fieri, of which a court of equity would not grant specific performance, and that, therefore the only right of the trustees and beneficiaries under the marriage settlement is to come in and prove with the other creditors.

Now, as to the first point Farwell, J., has decided, on the authority of the case of In re Pearson, that having regard to the fact that Mr. Isidore Bourke was at the date of the execution of the post-nuptial settlement entitled jure mariti to the property the subject of the settlement, the fact that the settlement contains a clause providing that his beneficial interest should continue until he should become bankrupt, or assign or attempt or affect to assign, is conclusive to make the settlement fraudulent within the statute of Elizabeth. I agree that this is the effect of the decision in the case of In re Pearson, and the court's decision bound Farwell, J., but the decision does not bind us, and I shall therefore consider whether or not it was right. I do not think that the decision in In re Pearson is right. I think that in each case you must look at the whole of the circumstances surrounding the execution of the conveyance, and then ask yourself the question whether the conveyance was in fact executed with the intent to defeat and delay creditors: Ex parte Mercer.

In my judgment, in the present case one ought not, on the evidence before us (even excluding the recital of the ante-nuptial promise), to find such intent. The property the subject of the settlement had been reversionary property in the right of the wife, and only came to the husband in her right. Under these circumstances it was right and proper that the husband should make some settlement, and the settlement which he in fact did make seems to me to have been a right and proper settlement for the husband to make, of property coming to him in the right of his wife, provided only he was not at the time of the execution of the settlement unable to pay his creditors, or contemplating entering upon or continuing in a business of such a speculative nature as to be likely to land him in financial embarrassments.

In the present case the settlement gives to the wife a first life interest and then to the husband if he survives the wife, but not otherwise, a life interest until he should become bankrupt or should assign or incumber, or attempt to assign or incumber his life interest, and after the failure and determination of the trusts declared in favour of the husband, the trustees were to stand possessed of the trust premises in trust for the children as the parents or their survivor might appoint.

I cannot draw the inference that this settlement was fraudulent or made with intent to defeat or delay creditors, in the absence of evidence of either indebtedness by the husband at the date of the settlement or of an intention by the husband at the date of the settlement to enter upon a speculative business likely to result in insolvency. There is no such evidence, and I have no reason to doubt but that as a fact the husband had no intention of defeating or delaying creditors, but only intended to reserve to himself, out of the property coming to him in the right of his wife, such an interest as after her death he could receive without prejudice to the welfare of her children. As long as he could so receive it he was to do so, but no longer. Suppose that the husband, being perfectly solvent and not contemplating a speculative business, had settled the whole of his property coming to him in the right of his wife on his wife for life, and after her death in trust for the children, would it have been possible to have drawn the inference that such a settlement was intended to defeat and delay creditors? If not, why is one to infer fraud because the husband gives himself a life interest, so long as he can receive the income of the money coming to him in right of the mother, without prejudice to the welfare of her children. I decline to draw any such inference.

The case of Montefiore v. Behrens, although it differs from the present case in that the wife's property was in possession and not in reversion is yet an authority that the settlement by the husband of property coming to him in right of his wife is not made fraudulent by a clause making the husband's life estate thereunder determinable on his bankruptcy.

It seems to me that the case of Middlecome v. Marlow, 2 Atk. 519, goes far to show that in the opinion of Lord Hardwicke a post-nuptial settlement by a husband of property coming to him in right of his wife is primâ facie good where there is no proof of his being indebted at the time, and that it is made upon such consideration as to prevail against creditors; and it is to be observed that the settlement was held not to be fraudulent within the meaning of 13 Eliz., although it contained a proviso empowering the trustee to lend a part or the whole to the husband. The trustee lent the husband the whole, and fourteen months after he became a bankrupt. The trustee brought his bill to be admitted a creditor, and Lord Hardwicke decreed he should come in as a creditor under the commission for the money he paid to the husband. If the money settled had not come to the husband in the right of his wife I cannot but think that the decision would have been different. Lord Hardwicke distinctly founds his decision on the money having come to the husband in right of his wife and on the deed, doing no more than the court would have done in a case where the husband had no estate of his own to settle.

As to the other question, that of the Statute of Frauds and the effect, if any, of the recital, I propose to examine the reason of the matter, as there seems to be some conflict in the authorities, or rather dicta. Now, the wife's mother, her guardians, and two trustees—one, I think, an executor of the father's will, are parties to the settlement. It is true that the recital does not in terms state who were the parties to the agreement, but I think, on a reasonable construction, the husband agreed with Miss Holland and her guardians: see Codrington v. Lindsay. If so, the recital, if contained in a writing outside the settlement, would satisfy the Statute of Frauds, and I cannot understand why the recital in the settlement is not enough to satisfy it. If the settlement had contained no recital, and the trustees had sought to enforce the agreement, it would have been enough if they had produced at the trial a memorandum in writing signed by the party to be charged, though none existed at the time of the contract, provided it were signed before the trial: see Maddison v. Alderson, 31 W. R. 820, 8 App. Cas. 467. The statute deals only with the evidence necessary to prove the agreement, and I know of no difference between agreements in consideration of marriage and other agreements within section 4—e.g., agreements to answer the debt, default, or misconduct of another. On the reason of the thing I think the recital gets over any objection based on the Statute of Frauds. No doubt the fact that the agreement is first mentioned in a post-nuptial settlement must be considered, but to my mind this does not touch the question on the Statute of Frauds. I think the court ought not to say that a post-nuptial agreement is voluntary if there is written evidence to satisfy the statute or an ante-nuptial agreement for good consideration, and this is the case here, the only difficulty being whether the agreement sufficiently indicates the parties. As I think it does, I will now deal with the authorities. Farwell, J., calls attention to those cases which in his opinion show that Barkworth v. Young cannot be supported, viz.: Spurgeon v. Collier, 1 Eden. 55; Warden v. Jones, 6 W. R. 180, 2 De G. & J. 76; and Trowell v. Shenton, 26 W. R. 837, 8 Ch. D. 318. Now Spurgeon v. Collier had nothing to do with creditors, and the plaintiff was not claiming through Collier, but against him. There was no proof of an ante-nuptial agreement, and the court held that the attempted proof of one failed in fact and therefore the deed was voluntary. Warden v. Jones is not, I think, an authority for the general proposition that a post-nuptial settlement, reciting that it was made in pursuance of an ante-nuptial agreement, cannot be good, since in that case there was no such recital, and though Lord Cranworth may have said that such an agreement would not satisfy the statute, this is very different from deciding that the settlement would have been void against creditors if it had contained such a recital. And the circumstances of the husband were such as to afford cogent evidence that he in fact executed the settlement with intent to defeat and delay creditors. Trowell v. Shenton was a case where it was held that an ante-nuptial agreement by an infant is not sufficient to take a post-nuptial settlement, in which no reference is made to the agreement, out of 27 Eliz. c. 4. No doubt Jessel, M.R., expresses the opinion that Lord Cranworth was right in his references in Warden v. Jones to the decision in Dundas v. Dutens, but it will be observed that Jessel, M.R.'s, observations were not necessary to the decision of the case, and that the case was really decided on Lord Tenterden's Act and not on the Statute of Frauds. Against these authorities there are the positive decision of Kindersley, V.C., in Barkworth v. Young, the dictum of Turner, L.J., in Surcome v. Pinniger, 3 De G. M. & G. 578, and the opinion of Lord Cottenham in Hammersly v. De Biel, 12 Cl. & F. 45, at pp. 61-2. It does not seem to me that anything said by Lord Cottenham in Lassence v. Tierney, 1 Mac. &. G. 551, as to the grounds of his decision in Hammersly v. De Biel can get rid of his deliberate differing from Sir W. Grant's doubt in Randall v. Morgan, 12 Ves. 67, at p. 73. And in the House of Lords counsel abandoned the Statute of Frauds point. The balance of authority and of reason supports the view of Kindersley, V.C., in Barkworth v. Young, where he held that a post-nuptial memorandum of an ante-nuptial agreement satisfies the statute. I think the settlement must prevail against the official receiver (1) because, even treating it as voluntary, the husband's circumstances at the date of it, the source of the property, and the lapse of time between the settlement and the bankruptcy, all go to negative intent to defeat or delay creditors; and (2) assuming it not to be fraudulent, because the recital is sufficient evidence against anyone claiming through the husband of a parol ante-nuptial agreement such as would prevent the post-nuptial settlement from being voluntary. The appeal must be allowed.

STIRLING, L.J.—The trustee in bankruptcy raises two objections to the payment of the fund to the trustees of the deed of the 8th of February, 1873—first, that the deed is fraudulent under the statute 13 Eliz. c. 5; and secondly, that it is voluntary, and resting as it does in covenant it cannot be enforced in equity, and therefore does not bind the property. These two objections involve different considerations and must be dealt with separately, but it will be convenient to make some preliminary observations on one point which arises with respect to both—viz., whether the recitals and statements of fact in the deed are admissible as evidence against the trustee in bankruptcy. These recitals and statements are in the nature of admissions made by the bankrupt long prior to the bankruptcy. Admissions of a party to an action or of one identified in interest with him are as against such party admissible in evidence: see Spargo v. Brown, 9 B. & C. 935; Woolway v. Rowe, 1 Ad. & E. 114). Now where the trustee in bankruptcy, on behalf of the creditors of the bankrupt, claims to treat the deed as void under the statute of Elizabeth, he is asserting a right which the bankrupt could not have set up, and is not identified in interest with the bankrupt; and consequently the recital and statement in the deed are not admissible against him, though they are admissible as against the trustee of the deed, whose interest is the same as that of the bankrupt. On the other hand, when the trustee resists specific performance of the covenants contained in the deed on the ground that it is voluntary, he is setting up a defence which would have been available to the bankrupt himself, and is identified in interest with him; and the recitals and statements in the deed are admissible against him, though the weight to be attached to them must depend on the circumstances of the case. The distinction just stated is recognized by the Master of the Rolls (Sir J. Plumer) in Battersbee v. Farrington, and appears to have been taken by Bramwell, B., in Harris v. Ricket, 4 H. & N. 6, 7 W. R. C. L. Dig. 9. As to the circumstances in which the deed was executed there is little or no evidence other than appears on the face of the deed itself. It was evidently executed after the marriage; but it purports to have been executed in consideration of marriage and in pursuance of an ante-nuptial agreement. For the reasons first stated these statements are not admissible in evidence as against the trustee in bankruptcy setting up the statute of Elizabeth. It was expressly decided by Lord Northington in Spurgeon v. Collier and Lord Cranworth in Warden v. Jones that a statement in a deed that it was executed in consideration of marriage was of no avail as against plaintiffs who claimed adversely to the deed, and in the latter case Lord Cranworth said that notwithstanding the dictum or decision of Lord Thurlow to the contrary in Dundas v. Dutens, his opinion was that the recital made no difference as against creditors. I think that the weight of authority is in favour of this view, that for the purpose of the decision of the question whether or not the deed of the 8th of February, 1873, is or is not void against creditors it must be taken that the deed is not founded on valuable consideration. The deed must therefore be treated as a voluntary settlement of the wife's fortune made by the bankrupt soon after marriage. Twenty-five years elapsed between the execution of the deed and the bankruptcy of the settlor, and there is nothing to suggest that the settlor was indebted at the time he made the settlement, or that any creditors he then had remained unpaid, or that he then had in contemplation any hazardous or speculative transactions. With an exception to be presently mentioned the deed is such as might in ordinary course be executed by a man of honour, who had without making any settlement married a lady of wealth, for the purpose of settling his wife's fortune in such a way as to secure to her and his issue by her such a provision as is in this country commonly made on the occasion of marriage; and indeed the trusts are (with the same exception) such as might have been adopted in a settlement by the court when called on by the wife to enforce her equity to a settlement. The exception is that under the settlement a life interest is reserved to the husband on the death of his wife and is made determinable on bankruptcy. The case does not fall within the line of authorities (such as Freeman v. Pope) which establish that under the statute a voluntary deed may be set aside without proof of actual intention to defeat or delay creditors if the circumstances are such that the settlement necessarily would have that effect; it lies on the trustee in bankruptcy to prove the existence of such intention: Ex parte Mercer. The only evidence to that effect is the circumstance that the bankrupt's reversionary life interest is made determinable in the way just mentioned. It may be that such a limitation of the bankrupt's life interest is void as against his trustee (see Higinbotham v. Holme), but does it invalidate the settlement altogether? Apart from authority I should think not. The only authority relied on is In re Pearson, a decision of Bacon, V.C., as chief judge in bankruptcy, but with the utmost respect I cannot think that the conclusion of fact (and it is one of fact) at which he arrived was well founded, and certainly I am unable to arrive at a like conclusion in the present case.

I pass on to consider the second objection—that the deed is voluntary and cannot be enforced in equity. The answer given to this objection on behalf of the trustees of the deed is in substance that the deed taken as a whole constitutes a note or memorandum of a parol ante-nuptial contract in consideration of marriage which satisfies the Statute of Frauds, and enables the contract to be enforced both against the settlor who signed the deed and against his trustee in bankruptcy, and so binds the property in question. I think that this contention is well founded. It is laid down by Lord Blackburn in Maddison v. Alderson that "it is now finally settled that the true construction of the Statute of Frauds, both sections 4 and 17, is not to render the contracts within them void, still less illegal, but to render the kind of evidence required indispensable when it is sought to enforce the contract." It is also established as regards many of the contracts within sections 4 and 17 that the note or memorandum need not be contemporaneous with the contract, but that it is sufficient if it comes into existence before the commencement of the action to enforce the contract: see Bill v. Bament, 9 M. & W. 36; Bailey v. Sweeting, 9 W. R. 273, 9 C. B. N. S. 843; Lucas v. Dixon, 37 W. R. 370, 22 Q. B. D. 357. In Lucas v. Dixon Fry, L.J., points out that where the plaintiff wishes to avail himself of a memorandum which comes into existence after the commencement of the action he can only do so by discontinuing and commencing a new action. The note or memorandum need not be given for valuable consideration, nor have any particular form; a letter by the party to be charged to a third party (Bailey v. Sweeting; Gibson v. Holland, 14 W. R. 86, L. R. 1 C. P. 1), an affidavit (Barkworth v. Young), and even a will (In re Hoyle, 41 W. R. 81, [1893] 1 Ch. 84) have each been accepted by the courts as sufficient. Farwell, J., has, however, held that the agreement or memorandum or note made on consideration of marriage must be reduced into writing and signed, not merely before action, but before the marriage. He says that the contract in consideration of marriage differs from contracts for sale within sections 4 and 17, because the marriage is performed once for all and is irrevocable, and that in contracts for sale the consideration continues if the whole purchase-money has not been paid, and if it has been paid the purchaser can recover it back if the contract is repudiated. I will assume this to be accurate as regards contracts of sale, but there are other contracts within sections 4 and 17—e.g., guarantees. The person to whom a verbal guarantee is given may, on the face of it, have once and for all irrevocably advanced a sum of money to a pauper from whom he can recover nothing back. Yet In re Hoyle shows that he can enforce the contract of guarantee if at any time before action is brought he is able to obtain a proper note or memorandum in writing signed by the guarantor. It seems to me, with all respect, that Farwell, J., has overlooked the point of the decisions that a note or memorandum is sufficient if it comes into existence before action brought. This is found in the language of the statute, which in section 4 prohibits the bringing of an action unless the agreement on which the action shall be brought, or some memorandum or note of it, is in writing. If, on the true construction of that section, the commencement of the action gives the limit within which the note or memorandum in a contract of guarantee may be reduced into writing and signed, I cannot see why another and narrower limit shall be imposed by the court with reference to contracts in consideration of marriage. Further, Barkworth v. Young is an express decision that such a contract may be enforced against a party who has signed a written memorandum of it after the marriage. There is no decision to the contrary, and much authority in the shape of dictum in support of it. In particular, though Farwell, J., may be right in saying that the ultimate decision in Hammersley v. De Biel turned on part performance by acts other than the marriage, still the judgments of Lord Langdale and Lord Cottenham show that they considered that a verbal ante-nuptial contract in consideration of marriage could be enforced if a proper memorandum were signed after marriage. The cases relied on to the contrary are Spurgeon v. Collier, Warden v. Jones, and Trowell v. Shenton. In the first two the plaintiffs were persons claiming adversely to an instrument purporting to have been executed in consideration of marriage; they were not identified in interest with the party who signed it, but stood in the same position as does the trustee in bankruptcy in the present case, when seeking to enforce rights under the statute of Elizabeth. These cases seem to me to be consistent with the proposition that an ante-nuptial verbal contract may be enforced against a party to it who has after marriage signed a written memorandum of it and also against a person identified in interest with him, as I think his trustee in bankruptcy is when he sets up, as here, a defence open to the bankrupt himself. They certainly do not establish the contrary proposition. Trowell v. Shenton was decided with reference to another statute and a different class of cases, but is relied on mainly for the observation of Jessel, M.R., that Warden v. Jones overruled Barkworth v. Young. But he expressly says: "So far as the two are inconsistent," and as I have just said, I think there is no inconsistency between them. But it was further said on behalf of the trustee in bankruptcy that even so, the deed does not satisfy the Statute of Frauds, because it only recites the agreement for settlement, and does not state with whom the husband agreed. No doubt the note or memorandum must show who the parties to the agreement are, but they need not be namely or specifically described as such; it is sufficient if by reasonable intendment it can be inferred from the document who they are: see Newell v. Radford, 16 W. R. 79, L. R. 3 C. P. 52. For this purpose the whole deed may be looked at, and I find the guardians of the wife named as parties, and the covenants of the husband are entered into with their approbation as such. They were the persons with whom the ante-nuptial contract would in ordinary course be made. I see no reason why they should have been made parties to the deed except that the contract was with them, and it is the reasonable intendment that it was actually made with them. I think this objection is not well founded, and that the appeal should be allowed.

COZENS-HARDY, L.J., after stating the facts, said:

There is no evidence that the husband was in difficulties or was contemplating entering on speculative transactions; in short, there is nothing to show that the settlement was executed with intent to defraud creditors. But Farwell, J., following Bacon, C.J., in In re Pearson, held that the limitation for the benefit of the settlor was in such a form as rendered the whole settlement fraudulent within the statute of 13 Eliz. I think it is not material on this point to decide whether the settlement was voluntary or for value, since everyone claiming under it was affected by notice of the provision in the settlement which, and which alone is said to avoid it in toto. But I treat it for this purpose as voluntary. In re Pearson is not supported by any prior authority, and I am not aware that it has ever been followed. I think it cannot be regarded as good law. It may well be that such a limitation of the settlor's life interest is void against creditors, but I see no ground for holding that it avoids the settlement in toto. The next point that arises is that the trustee cannot obtain specific performance of the settlement unless it was for valuable consideration, as it rests in covenant. I think it is clear that the trustee in bankruptcy is for this purpose in no better position than the settlor himself, apart from his bankruptcy, or than his executors would be. It has been argued that the settlement was necessarily voluntary because under section 4 of the Statute of Frauds a mere parol agreement before marriage imposes no obligation on the settlor, and further, that a note or memorandum of it must be signed before marriage. Farwell, J., adopted this view. It is well settled that in the case of other contracts within section 4—e.g., a guarantee—it is sufficient if the note or memorandum is made at any time before an action brought (Lucas v. Dixon), and it is strange that a different principle should prevail with reference to the one class of contracts made in consideation of marriage. There are dicta by Lord Hardwicke in Taylor v. Beech, 1 Ves. sen. 297, by Lord Langdale in De Biel v. Thomson, 12 Cl. & Fin. 61*n*, and by Turner, L.J., in Surcome v. Pinniger, and a decision by Kindersley, V.C., in Barkworth v. Young to the effect that a signed note or memorandum after marriage takes the case out of the Statute of Frauds, and I think these dicta and decisions are right and ought to be followed. If, therefore, there had been a note or memorandum signed by the husband after marriage and before the settlement I think an action for specific performance of the agreement could have been maintained against the settlor.

The next question, and to my mind the most difficult, is this, whether it is sufficient that the post-nupital settlement itself should be not merely a settlement in fact made in pursuance of an ante-nuptial parol contract, but also a memorandum of that contract. The settlement contains a recital which, though not sufficiently definite and precise to create an estoppel, is as against the settlor, and anyone claiming under him, evidence of a parol agreement for such a settlement between the settlor and his intended wife before marriage: see Codrington v. Lindsay, per Lord Selborne. There is no evidence to the contrary. The settlement was, ex hypothesi, executed for valuable consideration. Before the Statute of Frauds such a settlement would not have been voluntary, and the statute does not make it voluntary. It is really only a rule of evidence. The memorandum or note required by it may be before the deed, or in or after the deed, so long as it is before action brought. It seems to me that a settlement framed as this is may well be a memorandum in writing which satisfies the statute. Moreover, as a general rule evidence may be given to shew that a deed in form voluntary was in fact executed for valuable consideration: see Pott v. Todhunter, 2 Coll. 76; Gale v. Williamson, 8 M. & W. 405. A settlement in no way referring to the parol contract cannot be a note or memorandum of it, nor can the marriage be regarded as a part performance taking the case out of the statute. This, I think, is all that was decided by Lord Cranworth in Warden v. Jones, and his dictum, on which Farwell, J., relies, creates no difficulty when it is remembered that he was dealing with a case in which the plaintiff was asserting that the settlement was void as against creditors, and was therefore in a better position than the settlor. The result is that, in my opinion, there is sufficient and uncontradicted evidence that the settlement was not voluntary, and it follows that the trustees of it are entitled to the wife's share. Whether the official receiver is or is not entitled to the husband's life interest is a different question, which does not arise on the present summons, and the reversal of Farwell, J.'s, order will in no way prejudice this.

SAVILL BROS. (LIMITED) v. BETHELL. (a.)

Vendor and purchaser—Conveyance—Exception to be ascertained by subsequent election—Limitation of estate to commence in futuro—Invalidity of exception—Conveyance operating at common law—Statute of Uses—Perpetuity.

By a conveyance on sale certain freehold lands were conveyed unto and to the use of the purchaser in fee simple, with the exceptions and reservations set forth in the first schedule to the conveyance. This schedule contained the following words: "Save and except and reserving unto the vendors a piece of land not less than forty feet in width," commencing at a specified point and terminating "at the nearest road to be made by the purchaser or his assigns on the estate so as to give access to such road" from other lands of the vendors. The purchaser afterwards constructed certain roads on the estate. In an action brought to determine whether a plot of land on which a road had been commenced but not completed was excepted from the conveyance,

Held, that the conveyance operated at common law and not under the Statute of Uses, and that the exception was bad; but that even if the conveyance operated under the Statute of Uses it was equally bad as infringing the rule against perpetuities.

This was an appeal from a decision of Buckley, J., in an action raising the question whether a certain plot of land was validly excepted from the operation of a conveyance of certain lands at Ilford and East Ham, dated the 23rd of May, 1896. Previously to the conveyance in question certain lands situate both on the east and west side of the Tottenham and Forest Gate Railway were vested in the trustees of the will of one Charles Bartholomew (described in the conveyance as the vendors), who conveyed them by the following description: "All and singular the lands and hereditaments with the dimensions and abuttals thereof more particularly described in the first schedule hereto, and the plan annexed hereto, together with the rights of way in the said first schedule, and with the exceptions and reservations therein set forth"; to hold the same unto and to the use of the purchaser in fee simple.

The first schedule was, so far as material, in the following terms: "All that piece or parcel of land coloured blue in the plan drawn hereon containing thirty-seven acres or thereabouts situate in the parishes of Little Ilford and East Ham, in the county of Essex, being part of a larger piece of land . . . which said larger piece of land contains in the whole sixty-seven acres or thereabouts more or less, save and except and reserving unto the vendors a piece of land not less than forty feet in width commencing at the level crossing over the railway at the point marked A on the said plan and terminating at the nearest road to be made by the purchaser or his assigns on the estate so as to give access to such road from the land of the vendors lying on the east side of the Tottenham and Forest Gate Railway curve shown on the said plan."

There were also in the schedule reservations to the trustees of rights of way over all roads then existing or which might be made by the purchaser or those claiming under him on any of the lands conveyed, together with a right of way for those claiming under him over roads which might be made by the trustees or those claiming under them on their lands lying on the east side of the railway.

The plot of land as to which the question arose was part of that coloured blue on the plan, and was in the immediate neighbourhood of the level crossing at the point marked A.

It appeared that the property was conveyed for building purposes, and that roads were shortly afterwards laid out by the purchaser in accordance with a plan, which showed the plot in question as the site of a road reaching from the point A (mentioned in the schedule) to a circular road called Shakespeare-crescent. It was not proved that this or any other plan was in existence at the date of the conveyance, and so far as appeared the purchaser was under no obligation to construct the road. The road from point A to the crescent had been commenced, but the work had not been carried very far. The other roads shown on the plan were completed by the 31st of December, 1897.

The defendant Bethell had purchased the plot of land, and proposed to erect on it a public-house, in violation of a covenant contained in the conveyance, of which he had notice at the date of the purchase; he claimed that the plot was excepted from the conveyance.

The plaintiffs, who had acquired the right to enforce the covenant, brought this action for that purpose, when Buckley, J., held that the exception was void for perpetuity and uncertainty, and gave judgment in their favour.

Bethell appealed.

Neville, K.C., and H. M. Humphry, for the respondents.

The arguments used and the principal authorities cited appear in the judgment.

Duke of Sutherland v. Heathcote, [1891] 3 Ch. 504, [1892] 1 Ch. 475, 40 W. R. Dig. 71, and Cooper v. Stuart, 14 App. Cas. 286, 37 W. R. Dig. 130, were also referred to.

Cur. adv. vult.

May 15.—STIRLING, L.J., delivered the judgment of the court: [After stating the facts, his lordship continued:] It was contended on behalf of the plaintiffs that the exception was bad for uncertainty. The answer made by the defendant was that although at the date of the conveyance the position of the road on the property conveyed was perfectly uncertain, as also that of the piece of land not less than forty feet in width mentioned in the schedule, yet the position of both became subsequently defined by the act of the purchaser, which operated as an election, and so made the exception effectual; and it was also said that if the exception was bad the whole grant was rendered uncertain, so that nothing passed by the deed. The last point may be disposed of at once. It is a settled rule of construction that where there is a grant and an exception out of it the exception is to be taken as inserted for the benefit of the grantor, and to be construed in favour of the grantee: see Sheppard's Touchstone, p. 100; Earl of Cardigan v. Armitage, 2 B. & C. 197; Bullen v. Denning, 5 B. & C. 842. If, then, the grant be clear, but the exception be so framed as to be bad for uncertainty, it appears to us that on this principle the grant is operative and the exception fails.

The question, therefore, is whether the exception is good. It was admitted that if the conveyance had been by some modes of assurance—as, for example, a feoffment—the exception would have been bad. A similar point appears to have been decided in the time of Queen Elizabeth with respect to a feoffment which required an election to support it. The case is reported under the name of Bullock v. Burdett, 3 Dyer 281, Moo. 81, and is thus stated in Viner's Abridgment, Tit. Election A. 1: "If A. seised in fee of 100 acres enfeoffs B. of eighteen of the 100 acres (without assigning which of the 100 he enfeoffs him of) to hold to B. and his heirs when he please, this is a void feoffment, so that this cannot be made good by any election, because a livery cannot operate in future, but ought to pass the freehold presently or never, and therefore the feoffment is bad." It was said, however, that the law was otherwise with respect to grants, and in support of this proposition various passages were cited from Sheppard's Touchstone as well as some decided cases—Hungerford's case, 1 Leon. 30; Lee's case, 3 Leon. 106; and Jenkins v. Green, 7 W. R. 304, 27 Beav. 437. Of the passages in the Touchstone those most favourable to the appellants' contention appear to be the following (which are quoted from Preston's edition): "If the exception be set down uncertainly, as if one grant a house, excepting one chamber, or grant a manor, excepting one acre, but doth not set forth which chamber or which acre it shall be, these exceptions are void (for uncertainty. However, query, for there are authorities to the contrary—namely, that the exception may be available by election)" (p. 80). "If there be tenant for life of three houses and four acres of land, and he in reversion grant the reversion of two (of the) houses and of two (of the) acres of this land, this is a good grant, and hath sufficient certainty in it (to be rendered complete by election. But election must be made in the lifetime of the grantor or of the grantee)" (p. 250). "If one be seised of two acres of land, and he doth lease them for life and grant the remainder of one of them, and doth not say which, to J. S., then in this case, if J. S. make his election which acre he will have, the grant of the remainder to him will be good. [As to the point that it may be made good by election, query; and see supra, 250]" (p. 251). The comments of the learned editor appear to show that the law as to making good an uncertainty by election was not regarded by him as completely settled, and in any case the law laid down in the text requires some care in its application. The force of the phrase "making good or complete by election" will be understood from the following passage from Sir Rowland Heyward's case, 2 Rep. 36*a*: "Here is not election to claim one of two several things by one and the same title, but to claim one and the same thing by one of two several titles, for" (and this is the material part) "where the things are several, nothing passes before election and the election ought to be precedent, but when one and the same thing shall pass, then it passeth presently and the election of the title may be subsequent; and therefore if I have three horses and I give you one of my horses, in this case the election ought to be made in the life of the parties, for inasmuch as none of the horses is given in certain, the certainty and thereby the property begins by election." If, then, by a deed there had been a grant of a plot of land to be ascertained by election, it follows that until the election nothing passed; and if the deed granted certain specified lands with the exception of a plot to be ascertained by election, it seems to us that the deed would at once pass the whole, but subject to an exception which could only be ascertained and take effect when the election was made. Formerly a deed of grant was a mode of assurance applicable only to incorporeal hereditaments, including reversions and remainders, in land; but by virtue of 8 & 9 Vict. c. 106, s. 2, it was enacted that corporeal hereditaments as regards the conveyance of the immediate freehold thereof should be deemed to be in grant as well as in livery. The statute, however, in no way alters the rules of law with respect to the creation of estates. It appears to have been suggested in the argument in the case of Boddington v. Robinson 23 W. R. 925, L. R. 10 Ex. 270, that section 6 of the Act has this effect; but that section deals not with the creation of new estates but with the disposition of existing interests in real estate: see Challis on Real Property (2nd ed.), p. 99, where the question is discussed. The conveyance of the 23rd of March, 1896, is expressed to be to the purchaser to hold unto and to the use of the purchaser in fee simple. A conveyance in such a form as this has repeatedly been held to operate at common law and not under the Statute of Uses: Jenkins v. Young, Cro. Car. 230; Meredith v. Joans, Cro. Car. 244; Peacock v. Eastland, 18 W. R. 856, L. R. 10 Eq. 17; see Orme's case, 21 W. R. 171, L. R. 8 C. P. 281. This turns on the language of the statute, which only applies "where any person or persons . . . shall happen to be seised of and in any . . . hereditament to the use, confidence, or trust of any other person or persons: 27 Hen. 8, c. 10, s. 1. Now it has long been settled that according to the common law a limitation of an estate of freehold to commence in futuro is void: Buckler's case, 2 Rep. 55; Barwick's case, 5 Rep. 93; Roe v. Tranmarr, Willes 682; and see Challis (2nd ed.), p. 93. Indeed, the case already cited is an example of the operation of this very rule. If, then (as we think), the conveyance of the 23rd of March, 1896, operates at common law, the exception is bad.

If, however, it can be held that the conveyance operates under the Statute of Uses, then it appears to us that it is equally bad as infringing the rule against perpetuities, for the election, without which the exception is of no effect, need not be made, according to the terms of the conveyance, until after the nearest road had been made by the purchaser or his assignee, an event which need not necessarily occur within the period prescribed by the rule. It was contended that according to the law as stated in Sheppard's Touchstone the election must be made in the lifetime of both grantor and grantee, but the answer is that although this might be so if the deed had been silent on the subject, the parties have chosen to determine otherwise. On this part of the case the reasoning of Jessel, M.R., in London and South-Western Railway v. Gomm, 30 W. R. 620, 20 Ch. D. 562, see p. 580, appears to be important. This conclusion is not in conflict with any of the cases cited for the appellant, and is in accordance with the opinion expressed by Jessel, M.R., in Pearce v. Watts, 23 W. R. 771, L. R. 26 Eq. 492. There, speaking of a contract by which a vendor agreed to sell certain land, but reserved "the necessary land for making a railway through the estate to Princetown," he says (p. 493): "If the conveyance were executed in this form it is obvious that according to the present law the whole land would pass to the purchaser, the reservation being void for uncertainty." In our opinion, therefore, the plot of land as to which the question arises was not effectually excepted from the conveyance of the 23rd of March, 1896, and as the covenant sought to be enforced in this action extends to all the lands thereby conveyed, the appellant's case fails. We do not thereby decide that effect cannot in some other way be given to the intention, plain on the face of the deed, that the vendors should be entitled to access from their land on the east side of the railway to the roads which the purchaser proposed to make on the west side. The appeal will be dismissed with costs.

HERTFORDSHIRE COUNTY COUNCIL v. BARNET RURAL DISTRICT COUNCIL. (a.)

Highway—Surveyor of highways—Power to incur expenditure—Agreement with county council—Construction of bridge—Agreement for payment of money after expiration of surveyor's term of office—Liability of rural district council as successor to surveyor of highways—Highways and Bridges Act, 1891 (54 & 55 Vict. c. 63), s. 3—Local Government Act, 1894 (56 & 57 Vict. c. 73), s. 25.

The surveyor of highways for a parish, acting on behalf of himself and his successors as highway authority, entered into an agreement with the county council for the payment of a sum of money in two instalments by the highway authority for the parish towards the expenses to be incurred in the construction of a bridge. The second instalment was agreed to be paid on a date after the expiration of the surveyor's year of office. Before the expiration of that year the rural district council, under section 25 of the Local Government Act, 1894, became the highway authority for the parish. The work of constructing the bridge lasted a year. In an action by the county council against the rural district council to recover the second instalment,

Held, that the surveyor of highways had power, under section 3 of the Highways and Bridges Act, 1891, to enter into the contract, and that the rural district council were liable as his successors to pay the second instalment.

Appeal from the judgment of Lawrance, J., at the trial of an action without a jury.

The action was brought by the Hertfordshire County Council to recover the sum of £100 alleged to be due from the Barnet Rural District Council under an agreement dated the 24th of September, 1898.

On the 19th of April, 1898, Henry Lovejoy was appointed surveyor of highways for the parish of Totteridge, in the rural district of Barnet, for the period of one year.

By deed dated the 24th of September, 1898, Lovejoy, as surveyor of highways, entered into an agreement, on behalf of himself and his successors as highway authority, with the plaintiffs for the payment of two instalments of £100 each by the highway authority for the parish of Totteridge towards the expenses to be incurred in the construction of a bridge which was proposed to be erected for the purposes of carrying a main road over a ford known as Totteridge Ford, in the parish of Totteridge. The expenses of constructing the bridge were estimated at £600, and the residue of £400 was to be paid by the plaintiffs. The first instalment of £100 was agreed to be paid on the 31st of December, 1898, and the second on the 31st of December, 1899.

The erection of the bridge was begun on the 31st of October, 1898, and on the 2nd of January, 1899, Lovejoy, as surveyor of highways, paid the plaintiffs the first instalment of £100.

On the 1st of April, 1899, Lovejoy ceased to be surveyor of highways, and the defendants, by virtue of section 25 of the Local Government Act, 1894, became the highway authority for the parish of Totteridge, and all the powers, duties, and liabilities of the highway authority were thereby transferred to them.

The bridge was completed on the 25th of October, 1899. When the second instalment of £100 became due on the 31st of December, 1899, the defendants refused to pay on the ground that Lovejoy had no power to make any contract which would bind his successor.

The plaintiffs thereupon brought this action, contending that the surveyor of highways had power, under section 3 of the Highways and Bridges Act, 1891, to enter into the contract of the 24th of September, 1898, and that the defendants, as his successors, were bound to pay the second instalment of £100 out of the rates.

Section 3 of the Highways and Bridges Act, 1891, enacts as follows: "The council of any administrative county, and any highway authority or authorities, and the council of any adjoining county, may from time to time make and carry into effect agreements with each other for or in relation to the construction, reconstruction, alteration, or improvement, or the freeing from tolls, of any main road or other highway, or of any bridge (including the approaches thereto) wholly or partly situate within the jurisdiction of any one or more of the party or parties to the agreement. All expenses incurred by any such county council or highway authority, in pursuance of this section, shall be defrayed as part of the expenses incurred in relation to the maintenance, repair, improvement, or enlargement of bridges, main roads, or other highways by such council or highway authority, in such proportions as shall be determined by any such agreement as aforesaid, and any powers of borrowing applicable to the raising of any fund for the payment of any such expenses as aforesaid shall be applicable accordingly."

Lawrance, J., gave judgment for the plaintiffs.

The defendants appealed.

Macmorran, K.C., and Alexander Glen, for the defendants.—The surveyor of highways, not being a corporation, has no power to incur debts to be paid by his successors: see Frodingham Iron and Steel Co. v. Bowser, [1894] 2 Q. B. 791. No highway authority has power under any of the Highway Acts to enter into such a contract as that entered into by the surveyor of highways in this case. A highway board can only borrow money with the consent of the justices in quarter sessions: see sections 47, 48, and 49 of the Highway Act, 1864. What the surveyor did in this case was equivalent to a borrowing of money. It is unlikely that the Legislature intended to give a surveyor of highways larger powers than those possessed by a highway board. Section 5 of the Highway Rate Assessment and Expenditure Act, 1882, says that if the rates levied by a surveyor of highways is insufficient to meet the expenditure incurred by him, his successors may reimburse him the amount of the deficiency. That shows that the surveyor has no power to enter into a contract to be completed after the termination of his year of office. Section 3 of the Highways and Bridges Act, 1891, only extends the powers of the surveyor so as to enable him to incur certain expenses outside his district; it does not extend the time within which the expenditure may be incurred beyond his year of office.

Danckwerts, K.C., R. D. Muir, and T. R. Colquhoun Dill, for the plaintiffs, were not called upon to argue.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—In my opinion the appeal fails. It is hardly denied that the words of section 3 of the Highways and Bridges Act, 1891, are such that, if they are construed in their natural sense, the section gives the surveyor of highways as highway authority power to enter into such a contract as the present. But it is said that, if the court construed the words according to their plain meaning, they would be imputing to the Legislature that they had in this section passed a law not entirely consistent with previous legislation or legal history on these points. I do not think that is a good reason for not giving to the section the meaning naturally conveyed by its words. It is not sufficient to justify us in refusing to put on the section a construction in accordance with what seems to be the manifest intention of the Legislature. It may be that the Legislature did not contemplate that they were giving to the surveyor of highways larger powers than they had given to superior authorities. But that does not justify us in not giving effect to the meaning of the section. That being so, it seems to be clear that, by the Local Government Act, 1894, the duties and liabilities of the surveyor of highways in connection with this contract have passed to the rural district council.

ROMER, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. I think we ought not to put a narrow construction on section 3 of the Highways and Bridges Act, 1891. The power given by that section does not seem to me to be limited to a case where the work of constructing a bridge will not continue longer than the surveyor's term of office, or where the agreement provides for payment being made in advance. I do not see why the agreement may not provide for payment to be made when the work is terminated or from time to time while it proceeds. The contrary contention would render it very difficult for the surveyor to make any contract near the end of his term of office, and in my opinion the section clearly contemplates that the power of entering into contracts may be exercised by the surveyor at any time during his term of office. No doubt the power must be exercised reasonably, but the contract in this case—a contract in relation to the construction of a bridge, which took a year to build—seems to me to be a reasonable and proper contract, and to be one which comes within the powers of the section.

AERATORS (LIMITED) v. TOLLIT AND OTHERS. (a.)

Company—Registration—Similarity of name—Deception—Companies Act, 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 89), s. 20.

The plaintiffs carried on business under the name of "Aerators (Limited)." The defendants sought to register a company under the name of "Automatic Aerator Patents (Limited)."

Held, that a name is not necessarily calculated to deceive because it is similar, and that on the facts there was not any probability of deception, and that the plaintiffs were not entitled to restrain the defendants from registering their company.

The plaintiff company, Aerators (Limited), claimed an injunction to restrain the defendants from registering a company under the title "Automatic Aerator Patents (Limited)" or any other name so nearly resembling the name of the plaintiff company as to be calculated to deceive.

The plaintiff company was registered on the 15th of February, 1900.

The defendants were the seven signatories of the company proposed to be registered.

The Companies Act, 1862, s. 20, provides: "No company shall be registered under a name identical with that by which a subsisting company is already registered, or so nearly resembling the same as to be calculated to deceive . . ."

Jenkins, K.C., and J. G. Wood, for the plaintiffs.

Upjohn, K.C., and George Lawrence, for the defendants.

FARWELL, J., in giving judgment, said: The plaintiffs, Aerators (Limited), claim an injunction to restrain the defendants from registering a company under the name of "Automatic Aerator Patents (Limited)" on the ground that such name so nearly resembles the plaintiffs' name as to be calculated to deceive within the meaning of section 20 of the Companies Act, 1862. The plaintiffs were incorporated in 1900 and took over the business of a similar company of the same name incorporated in 1896. Their business consists in the sale of sparklets. This word is their trade-mark and they have largely advertised "sparklets." I understand them to be a small apparatus containing carbonic acid gas, by means of which, contents of bottles are aerated. One of the merits claimed for them is their portability and their applicability to a small quantity of liquid. The defendants propose that the new company to be formed by them shall acquire patents for the aeration of liquids contained in tanks or cisterns of large size, and shall either work such patents themselves or shall form subsidiary companies for the development of such patents. Section 20 of the Companies Act enacts that no company shall be registered under a name identical with that by which a subsisting company is already registered or so nearly resembling the same as to be calculated to deceive, except in certain cases which are not material to the present case. It will be observed that a company has therefore a greater right than an individual in respect of names that are identical, for John Smith cannot prevent other persons of the same name from using their own names, but John Smith (Limited) can prevent the registration of any other company as John Smith (Limited). I do not consider, however, that it follows that the Legislature has intended to give companies any greater rights than individuals possess in respect of names which are not identical but only similar: and it has been held that "calculated to deceive" does not point to intentional fraud, but it is a question of fact in each case whether the name of the new company is so similar to that of the old company as to induce the belief that the two companies are identical.

In considering this question it is material to ascertain—(1) What business has been or is intended to be carried on by the old company, and what is intended to be carried on by the new, and (2) what sort of name has been adopted by the old company. As to to the first point, I do not think that it is sufficient for an existing company to point to clauses in its memorandum which will enable it to extend its operations to numerous classes of trade, unless it can satisfy the court that it either has carried on or really proposes within a limited time to carry on such particular businesses. It cannot, I think, be enough in these days, when the objects of a company are usually limited only by the number of letters in the alphabet and extend to every form of business whether connected or not with the principal object, to show that the intended new company includes some similar objects. It is necessary to see whether the real objects of the two companies are similar. As to the second point, I think that it is necessary to consider the nature of the title registered by the old company. The plaintiffs have argued that the House of Lords, in the case of North Cheshire and Manchester Brewery Co. v. Manchester Brewery Co., [1899] A. C. 83, 47 W. R. Dig. 192, decided that in no case can a new company take the whole title of an existing company, whatever additional words they may add to it, and they accordingly claim a monopoly of the word "Aerators." In my opinion this is not correct. The House of Lords found as a fact in the case before them that the adoption by the defendant company of the whole of the plaintiffs' title, although added to other words, was "calculated to deceive," but it appears to me impossible to say as a general proposition that a company can, by registering a single word, whatever its nature, remove that word from the English language so far as regards its use in the title of subsequent companies. In the present case the plaintiffs have taken a word which, and which only, aptly and rightly describes a machine for producing a particular result. The word has been in common use in the English language for at least thirty years. It is to be found in dictionaries such as the Century (1889), Murray's Dictionary (1891), and in the Dictionary of Mechanics (1876), to which one of the witnesses referred. It would obviously lead to the greatest inconvenience if any company could prevent all other companies from using as part of their title the one word in the English language which aptly describes the articles they manufacture or deal in, or the name of the individual associated for years with a particular firm. For example, suppose a company had registered the name of "Motors (Limited)," and another the name of "Automobiles (Limited)"; it appears to me impossible to say that they could thereby prevent all other companies from using as part of their title these two words, which, so far as I know, are the only words which represent the fashionable locomotives of the day, although their sole trade was the manufacture or sale of motors or automobiles. Or again, to take an instance of names, it would be absurd to suppose that Barclay & Co. (Limited), the well-known bankers, could restrain Barclay, Perkins, & Co. (Limited), the well-known brewers, from registering as such on the ground that they take the whole of the title of the banking firm. In considering whether a name is calculated to deceive, it is, as I have said, material to see what that name is, and if the name is simply a word in ordinary use representing a machine or an article of commerce, the probability of deception is out of all proportion less than it would be in the case of an invented or fancy word, or even of the name of a place. The latter may well point to a particular company; the former certainly points primâ facie to the machine or article, and can only under very exceptional circumstances and by a long course of usage point to the company rather than the thing itself. English-speaking people know "aerators," "motors," and the like as machines, not as companies, and the presence of such a word in the title of a company suggests that the company deals in those machines, not that it has anything to do with a company of that name. If the plaintiffs assert the contrary, it is for them to prove it, and the principles applied by the House of Lords in Reddaway v. Banham, 44 W. R. 638, [1896] A. C. 199, explained as they were in Cellular Clothing Co. v. Maxton, [1899] A. C. 326, 47 W. R. Dig. 193, to which I had occasion to refer in Chivers v. Chivers, 17 Rep. Pat. Cas. 420, apply as much to the name of a company under section 20 as to the camel's hair belting, the cellular clothing, or the name of Chivers in those cases. I will read the passage from Lord Shand's speech, Cellular Clothing Co. v. Maxton, at p. 340, which I read in Chiver's case: "The case on which the appellants have chiefly relied is that of the camel-hair belting, Reddaway's case. Of that case I shall only say that it no doubt shows it is possible, where a descriptive name has been used, to prove that so general, I should rather say so universal, has been the use of it as to give it a secondary meaning, and so to confer on the person who has so used it a right to its exclusive use, or, at all events, to such a use that others employing it must qualify their use by some distinguishing characteristic. But I confess I have always thought, and I still think that it should be made almost impossible for anyone to obtain the exclusive right to the use of a word or term which is in ordinary use in our language and which is descriptive only, and, indeed, were it not for the decision in Reddaway's case, I should say this should be made altogether impossible."

The plaintiffs further argued that the Act of Parliament was intended for the protection of the public, and that there must necessarily be some confusion in the minds of the public if the whole of their title is taken; but I would point out that the plaintiffs cannot assert in their own names the rights of the public—that is for the Attorney-General. They can only assert their own rights as members of the public if and so far as they can show special damage to themselves. But the choice of their own name rests with themselves. The registrar has no discretion to refuse to register any name put forward on behalf of a company, and if by reason of their adoption of one single word in common use they run the risk of suffering injury, they have only themselves to thank, and they can no more acquire a monopoly in the use of the word "Aerators" by adopting that as their title, than an individual can acquire a monopoly in his own name or the name of the article that he manufactures. As in the latter case it is necessary for the individual to show not merely that the defendant is trading under his name or is making the article the name of which he has adopted, but must also show that the name or article is exclusively identified with his own manufacture so as to have acquired a secondary meaning, so a company must also show that the name which primâ facie refers to a number of persons or articles is in fact identified solely with the plaintiffs before they can satisfy the court that its use as part of another company's name is calculated to deceive. A name is not necessarily calculated to deceive because it is similar. It must depend in great measure upon what the nature of the name is, and if it merely represents the name of the article supplied by the company, it would require very strong evidence to show that such name had lost its primary meaning and had become identified with the plaintiff company.

In the case before me, as indeed in all cases under section 20, the action is a quia timet action, and evidence of actual mistake is therefore impossible, but there is in fact no evidence, to my mind, of any probability of deception. The plaintiffs' trade-mark is "sparklets," and their name is put prominently forward on their shop-fronts, invoices, bill-heads, and letter-paper. The articles in which they deal are very different from those to be manufactured under the defendants' patents. When the plaintiffs ascertained that the defendants intended to register the Automatic Aerator Patents (Limited) they themselves applied to register another company under the same or all but the same title, and were only prevented from so doing because the defendants' application was first lodged. The plaintiffs' managing director, who gave his evidence in a very fair and candid manner, stated that although their chief object was to be beforehand with the defendants and prevent their registration of the name, yet that they had intended that the new company should carry on business under this title, and that, if proper care was taken, they did not anticipate that any confusion would arise. But this new company of the plaintiffs was intended to deal in articles similar to those sold by the plaintiffs, and if due care can prevent confusion in such a case, a fortiori can it do so where the articles dealt in are so different as those of the plaintiffs' and defendants'. In my opinion the plaintiffs' action is an attempt to monopolize for the purposes of nomenclature a word in ordinary use in the English language, and fails, and must be dismissed with costs.

Settled land — Capital money — Leasehold house — Additions with a view to letting—Electric light installation—Settled Land Act, 1890 (53 & 54 Vict. c. 69), s. 13 (ii.).

The word "additions" in section 13 (ii.) of the Settled Land Act, 1890, means structural additions.

The installation of the electric light in a leasehold house, although reasonably necessary to enable the house to be let, is not a structural addition within the meaning of the section, and cannot, therefore, be paid for out of capital moneys.

Adjourned summons.

This summons was taken out by the tenant for life of a certain leasehold house, asking that the cost of certain improvements which had been made by him might be allowed out of capital moneys in the hands of the trustees as being improvements within the meaning of section 13 (ii.) of the Settled Land Act, 1890.

It appeared that on the 19th of August, 1901, the tenant for life entered into negotiations for the lease of the house as a shooting lodge; it was stipulated by the intending lessee that certain improvements should be made and possession given by the 1st of September.

Consequently, the improvements had to be made without submitting a scheme to the court.

The present application was, accordingly, made under section 15 of the Settled Land Act, 1890.

One of the improvements the cost of which was now sought to be charged against capital consisted in the wiring of the house for electric light.

W. A. Peck (Birrell, K.C., with him), for the tenant for life.—An electric lighting installation is an "addition" reasonably necessary within the meaning of the Settled Land Act, 1890: In re Freake's Settlement, ante, p. 237, [1902] 1 Ch. 97, which has since been followed by Kekewich, J., in chambers, in In re Lord Howe's Settled Estates. The "addition" need not be structural. In re Gaskell's Settled Estates, 42 W. R. 219, [1894] 1 Ch. 485, appears to be against the applicant on that point; if that is the case, the two decisions can only be reconciled by saying that the installation of an electric light system is a structural addition.

Herbert Robertson, for the trustees, was not called on.

BUCKLEY, J.—The question to be determined on this summons is as to the true construction in section 13 (ii.) of the Settled Land Act, 1890, of the words "additions to or alterations in buildings." Mr. Peck, on behalf of the tenant for life, has addressed an argument to the court which involves the proposition that the word "additions" means additions of any kind, and that an addition to be within the section need not be structural. If the word be so understood, it would follow that there would fall within it venetian blinds, sun blinds, furniture in the house, and a park added to a house which had none. All these are additions to a building, but they are not additions within the section. I think the word "addition" in the section means a structural addition in some sense. The frame of the section shows that an addition or alteration means an addition to or alteration in the building. The argument of the tenant for life amounts to this, that of these two nouns substantive, although the word "alteration" must mean structural alteration, the other word "addition" does not mean a structural addition, but the addition of anything. I do not understand that to be the true construction of the section. I understand the section to mean the addition to the building of some further building or the alteration of the building by removing and replacing in some form part of the building—that is to say, that both the one and the other must be structural. The question is not without authority; it was considered by Chitty, J., in In re Gaskell's Settled Estates. The question there was whether a fixed boiler with hot water pipes running through the house was an addition within the section. No doubt, in a sense, it was an addition, but the learned judge held that it was not an addition within the meaning of the section. He construed these words as meaning structural additions or alterations. He says: "Section 13 (ii.) is very precise in its terms, and is confined to 'additions to or alterations in buildings,' and any improvement authorized under this sub-section (ii.) must, therefore, be an addition or alteration in the building." Then at the top of the next page he says: "I am of opinion that this warming apparatus, however convenient it may be to the occupier, is neither an addition to or alteration in the building within the section." Although throughout the judgment he does not use the word "structural," his language points to the conclusion that he meant it. He then says: "As regards the change in the main entrance, and the other minor alterations consequent thereon, they appear to have been alterations in the structure of the building itself." He then goes on to discuss the matter of the new roof and goes into it in this way: "Then a question of a metaphysical nature arises as to the identity of the house. Is a house with a rotten roof identical with the house it becomes when the roof has been replaced with a new and sound one?" It would have been unnecessary to discuss that unless he had meant to say that the alterations and additions must be structural. Then it is said that in In re Freake's Settlement, Joyce, J., had held that an installation of electric light fell within the sub-section. I have had an opportunity of seeing the learned judge and he authorizes me to state that he did not in that case intend to lay down any general principle, but that his decision was to be confined to the facts of that particular case. But, however that may be, where there is a conflict between two decisions, I am at liberty to act on my own judgment, and my own view is that the addition or alteration must be structural. I do not mean to limit an inquiry as to whether any particular additions or alterations are structural or not, but the present matter I have to deal with is this: There was a house for which a tenant could be found if electric light were installed. The installation was no doubt necessary, in order to enable the house to be let; but, in my opinion, it was not an addition within the meaning of the section, because it was not structural. I cannot distinguish between this case and In re Gaskell's Settled Estates. I therefore disallow the first item in the summons—£148 15s. for installation of electric light.

PRYCE-JONES v. WILLIAMS. (a.)

Vendor and purchaser—Leaseholds—Conditions of sale—Title—Requisition out of time—Imperfect abstract—Outstanding legal estate—Costs.

Property stated to be held on leases was contracted to be sold subject to a condition requiring the purchaser to deliver requisitions and objections on or to the title within fourteen days after receiving his abstract, and in this respect time was to be deemed of the essence of the contract. The abstract showed only an equitable beneficial title in the vendors, and the legal estate was outstanding owing to the non-execution by a company (which had since been dissolved), through whom the vendors made title, of any legal assignment of the leases. Upon the purchaser raising an objection upon this point out of the time prescribed by the condition:

Held, that, as the purchaser got a perfect equitable title and could get the legal estate by application to the Crown, his objection did not go to the root of the title as to free him from the condition limiting the time for delivery of objections and requisitions, and must therefore be deemed waived, and could not be insisted upon.

Vendor and purchaser summons.

In April, 1884, two leases were granted to a company incorporated in 1869 under the title of the Van Mining Co. (Limited). In 1884 this company was dissolved and a new company formed under the same title, which purchased the assets of the 1869 company, including the leases, but no legal assignment of the leasehold terms was executed by the 1869 company. In 1891 the second company went into liquidation and sold its assets to a third company then formed under the same title, but again there was no legal assignment of the leasehold terms.

The debenture-holders of the latter company obtained an order for sale under the direction of the court of their security, which included the two leases, and they were subsequently sold by private contract subject to conditions framed for a sale by auction, but which were made applicable so far as possible to a sale by private contract, of which condition 6 (so far as material), was as follows:

"Each purchaser is within fourteen days after the actual delivery of the abstract to deliver . . . a statement in writing of his objections and requisitions (if any) to or on the title as deduced by such abstract; and upon the expiration of such last-mentioned time, and in this respect time is to be deemed of the essence of the contract, the title is to be considered as approved of, and accepted by, such purchaser subject only to such objections and requisitions, if any." The particulars stated that the property was "held on lease."

The purchaser, after the expiration of the prescribed time, objected that no title was shown by the vendors to the leases, because the legal estate therein remained outstanding.

The vendors thereupon took out this summons asking (in effect) for specific performance of the contract by the purchaser.

There was a cross-summons by the purchaser asking for rescission and consequential relief.

R. J. Parker, for the vendors, undertook to obtain the lessor's consent to the assignment to the purchaser of the residue of the terms.

A. Dunham, for the purchaser.—The vendors show no title to what they agreed to sell—viz., a legal leasehold estate, and not a mere equitable interest. As to the requisition being out of time, no perfect abstract was ever delivered, for no assignments were abstracted, and there was no such title shown as would enable the vendors to insist on the time condition; a mere consent by the lessor to a new assignment would not heal the defect, for it would not confer privity of contract. I rely upon Want v. Stallibrass, 21 W. R. 685, L. R. 8 Ex. 175, and In re Tanqueray-Willaume and Landau, 30 W. R. 801, 20 Ch. D. 466.

JOYCE, J. (after stating the facts and reading condition 6), said: In my opinion the legal estate is outstanding in the Crown as bona vacantia; it cannot be seriously contended that the abstract was imperfect; it seems to me to have been the most perfect in the vendors' possession, and on consideration I cannot see why the purchaser should not be bound by the condition limiting the time for delivering objections, and held to have waived this objection. It is not an objection which goes to the root of the title; the purchaser will get a perfect equitable title and the means of getting in the legal estate by applying in the right quarter. On the other hand I think that the vendors should have made special provision in the contract to cover this defect in their title, and though they are entitled to an order I do not think this is a case for costs. Each party will therefore bear their own costs and the purchaser's summons will be dismissed, but without costs. The vendors are to procure the consent of the lessor to the assignments to the purchaser.

Order as asked by vendors' summons.

MARTEN v. STEAMSHIP OWNERS' UNDERWRITING ASSOCIATION (LIMITED). (a.)

Insurance—Marine—Insured value to be taken as repaired value—Reinsurance against total loss—"To pay as may be paid thereon."

Attached to a policy of insurance on a vessel was a clause that "the insured value shall be taken as the repaired value in ascertaining whether the vessel is a constructive total loss." The vessel was valued at £16,000 and was insured against all risks. The underwriter effected a policy of reinsurance on the vessel against total, including constructive total, loss only "being a reinsurance applying to policy or policies and to pay as may be paid thereon." During the period covered by the policies the vessel ran ashore, and notice of abandonment was given. The vessel could have been repaired at a less sum than £16,000, and if the ordinary rules had been applied the vessel would have been a constructive total loss.

Held, that the reinsurers were not liable under the reinsurance policy, since the original underwriter was not liable for a constructive total loss, and that the words "pay as may be paid thereon" meant that he could only recover such a sum as he could have been compelled to pay.

Action tried in the Commercial List without a jury.

This was an action brought by the plaintiff, who was an underwriter of a policy of insurance on The William Symington, against the defendants under a policy of reinsurance.

The facts and arguments appear in the judgment.

Cur. adv. vult.

May 15.—BIGHAM, J., gave the following judgment: By a policy of the 29th of May, 1899, the plaintiffs underwrote a vessel called The William Symington against all risks for twelve months. The vessel was valued in the policy at £16,000. Attached to the policy was a printed memorandum containing what are called the Institute Time Clauses, one of which is as follows: "The insured value shall be taken as the repaired value in ascertaining whether the vessel is a constructive total loss." The effect of this clause is that, if the vessel becomes damaged by the perils insured against, the owner, before he can recover for a constructive total loss, must show that the cost of repairing her will exceed £16,000. The plaintiffs had taken risks on many other vessels, in respect of which they had issued other policies. At the end of the year they were desirous of reinsuring all these risks, and accordingly they effected a policy of reinsurance with the defendants, which is the policy sued on. It is dated the 3rd of January, 1900, and it covers a sum of £42,884 "upon the vessels as per schedule annexed." The schedule contains the names of about 100 vessels, one of them being The William Symington. In the body of the policy there is a valuation clause in the following words: "The said steamships, by agreement between the assured and assurers in this policy, being valued at as per schedule annexed or as per original policy or policies." On turning to the schedule it is found that The William Symington is valued at £16,000 and is covered to the amount of £650. The risk is described in the policy as "against the risk of total and (or) constructive total loss only warranted free of all average and (or) salvage charges, being a reinsurance applying to policy or policies, and to pay as may be paid thereon." Thus it will be seen that, whereas the original policy was against total or partial loss (all risks), the reinsurance was only against total or constructive total loss. The Institute Time Clauses were printed on the reinsurance policy, but many of them were struck out by an ink line being drawn diagonally through them; the clauses so struck out were such as applied more particularly to cases of partial loss, and were inapplicable to a policy against total loss. They included, however, the clause by which it is stipulated that the insured value is to be taken as the repaired value in ascertaining whether the vessel is a constructive total loss. This clause is numbered 14, and the diagonal line went down from number 5 to number 15 inclusive, thus traversing number 14. During the period covered by the two policies—namely, on the 9th of December, 1899—The William Symington ran ashore at Chioggia, in the Adriatic, and on the 20th of December the owner served the plaintiffs with notice of abandonment. The vessel was floated on the 23rd of February, 1900, and was towed into Venice. There some temporary repairs were done to her, and she was then taken to Fiume, where she was sold to a Mr. Fragala for a sum of £5,200. Mr. Fragala repaired her, and she is now trading on his account. Having heard the evidence as to the cost of proper repairs to restore the vessel to her original class, I am satisfied of two things—first, that if the ordinary rules are applied to ascertaining the fact, the vessel was a constructive total loss at the date of the notice of abandonment. I mean that a prudent uninsured owner would not have repaired her; he would have made the best of a bad job by selling the wreck as it lay at Chioggia; but I am also well satisfied of a further fact—namely, that if the repaired value is to be taken at £16,000, and not at its true figure, then the vessel was not a constructive total loss. She could have been repaired at a cost which, after taking everything into account, would have been much less (less by some thousands of pounds) than £16,000. The question I have to consider is whether the plaintiffs ever became liable to pay a constructive total loss to the shipowners within the meaning of the reinsurance policy. If they did become liable to pay such a loss and have compromised with the shipowners for a payment of some less sum, the defendants will get the benefit of the abatement. The whole question of the defendants' liability of course turns upon the true construction to be placed upon the reinsurance policy. The defendants say that the only risk they undertook was the risk of the plaintiffs having to pay as for a total or a constructive total loss on their policy with the shipowners—that is to say, on the basis of a repaired value of £16,000; and that as the plaintiffs never became liable to pay such a loss no cause of action has arisen on the reinsurance policy. On the other hand, the plaintiffs say that the defendants are not entitled to inquire whether the plaintiffs had become liable for a constructive total loss on the original policy; and that it is sufficient for the plaintiffs to show a constructive total loss on the basis of the actual repaired value of the ship. Thus the question is reduced to this—Is the clause that the insured value shall be taken as the repaired value to be read into the reinsurance policy? I will first examine this policy as though it contained no express reference of any kind to this clause—that is to say, as though the clause had never appeared in print in the margin and had never been struck through in ink, as already described. What then would have been the meaning of the policy? Now, I think, the meaning quite plain, it is a "reinsurance"; that expression connotes the idea of something already insured. Then what was already insured? The answer is two things, namely, the risk of total loss and the risk of partial loss; but the defendants only reinsured one of these two risks, that is to say, the risk of total loss. But, again, what risk of total loss? The answer is only the risk which arises when the repaired value is taken at £16,000. The plaintiffs are not liable for any other kind of total loss, and therefore cannot reinsure any other kind. The fact is that the sole object of the reinsurance policy was to indemnify the plaintiffs against the risk of total loss covered by the policy which they themselves had issued. Then does it make any difference that the clause can be seen in the print, and has been struck through by the ink line? It is said that this shows an intention to let the question of constructive total loss, if it arises, be determined without reference to the agreed value; in other words, that it shows an intention to reinsure a kind of constructive total loss which does not form the subject of the already existing policy. But, even if any significance at all ought to be attached to the striking out of the clause, there are two answers to this contention; first, that the body of the policy is so worded as to make the clause quite unnecessary—the body of the policy, as I have already said, indemnifies against the risk in the original policy, and against that risk only; and, secondly, that it may well be that, among the many original policies issued in respect of the other 100 ships, there are some which do not contain the repaired value clause; in which case it would be right to strike the clause out of the reinsurance policy. In the way in which the body of the policy is worded it covers all the original risks against total loss or constructive total loss whether the original policies contain the clause or do not contain it, and this is exactly what the parties intended. In truth the plaintiffs have sustained a very large partial loss on the original policy, and they want to recover it back under the reinsurance policy against constructive total loss only. This they cannot be allowed to do. The plaintiffs further say that, having paid as for a constructive total loss on the basis of a repaired value of £16,000, they ought to be allowed to recover against the defendants, as the reinsurance policy contains the words "to pay as may be paid on the original policy." But the answer is, first, that they have not paid as for a constructive total loss. They may so describe the payment which they have made, but it was, in fact, only a payment for a large partial loss; and, secondly, even if they have paid as for a constructive total loss, inasmuch as, in my opinion, they were not liable to pay they cannot recover. The words "to pay as may be paid" mean only to pay as the reassured may have been compellable to pay.

Sunday trading—Bakers Act—Consent in writing of chief constable—Sunday Observance Act, 1871—Lord's Day Act (Car. 2, 1663)—London Bread Act (3 Geo. 4, c. 106), s. 16.

The provision in the Sunday Observance Act, 1871, requiring the consent in writing of the chief constable to any prosecution is not applicable to the London Bread Acts regulating the sale of bread, which form a special code by themselves.

This was the hearing of a rule nisi calling on R. Mead, Esq., a Metropolitan Police Magistrate, to show cause why a mandamus should not be granted to state a case.

The following facts were proved before the police magistrate:—

The defendant Wrebitzky carries on business as a baker at 20, Commercial-road, E., and the defendant Grodzinsky at 31, Fieldgate-street, E.C.

On the 17th of February, 1902, a summons was taken out against each defendant for on the 16th of February, 1902, at 8.15 a.m., unlawfully exercising or causing to be exercised the trade or calling of a baker by selling and exposing for sale bread, contrary to the statute on the Lord's Day.

Two other summonses were also issued for delivering on that date.

The summonses were heard on the 19th of February, and the magistrate then convicted both the defendants and inflicted a fine of twelve shillings and sixpence costs.

He was applied to, to state a case, but refused on the ground that it was frivolous.

On the 3rd of March, an application was made for a rule nisi to state a case on various grounds and the Divisional Court granted it on the point whether the Sunday Observance Act, 1871, applied to the local Act regulating the sale and making of bread in London.

By section 16 of 3 Geo. 4, c. 106 (London Bread Act) it is provided: that no master, mistress, or other person respectively, exercised or employed in the trade or calling of a baker within the limits aforesaid shall on the Lord's Day or any part thereof make or bake any bread, rolls, or cakes of any sort or kind, or shall on any other part of the same day than between the hours of nine of the clock in the forenoon and one of the clock in the afternoon sell or expose to sale any bread, rolls, or cakes of any sort or kind.

By section 1 of the Sunday Observance Act, 1871, it is provided that no prosecution or any other proceeding shall be constituted . . . for any offence committed by him under the Act of the twenty-ninth year of the reign of Charles II. entitled Act for the Better Observation of the Lord's Day commonly called Sunday, or for the recovery of any forfeiture or penalty for any such offence except by or with the consent in writing of the chief officer of police, of the police district in which the offence is committed, or of two justices of the peace, or of a stipendiary magistrate having jurisdiction where the offence is committed.

No such consent had been obtained in this case.

Powell, K.C. (McBurnet with him), showed cause.—The Act of 1871 does not apply. The object of the London Bread Acts was to regulate the sale of bread in the metropolis, and to sanction a limited breach of the law.

Henriques, in support of the rule.—This is an offence under the Act of Charles II. The Bread Acts are merely explanatory of the Act of Charles II.

He cited R. v. Younger, 5 T. R. 449.

Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J.—This is the hearing nisi of a rule moved before us in order to compel the magistrate to state a case. If it were necessary we should be willing to make the rule absolute, but as we are in a position of knowing all the facts of the case we think that we can now deal with the matter. The contention of the appellants is that the words of the Sunday Observance Act, 1871, apply to prosecutions under the London Bread Acts. However much we may desire it I think it is plain they do not. The Sunday Observance Act provided that all prosecutions under the Act of Charles II. should be subject to the consent in writing of the chief constable, or of two justices of the peace, or of a stipendiary magistrate. The statutes relating to the making and baking of bread, and ranging from 34 Geo. 3 to 3 Geo. 4, form a complete code in themselves. The Act of Charles II. exempted works of necessity and charity, and the Legislature may well have thought that some special protection should be provided by the Act of 1871. But as regards the special code relating to the baking of bread, with special provisions as to time and the exemptions which are to prevail, it seems to us that the Act of 1871 does not apply to those Acts. It is important to notice that some offences are offences under the Bread Acts which are not offences under the Act of Charles II. To make the Act of 1871 apply to the Bread Acts you would have to find either words clearly mentioning them or words of necessary implication. We are unable to find any such words in the Act, and the rules will therefore be discharged.

Where two prisoners are tried together, and one of them gives evidence, under section 1 of the Criminal Evidence Act, 1898, on his own behalf, and in the course of it gives evidence incriminating the other prisoner, the former can be cross-examined by the latter as well as by the prosecution.

Case stated by Ridley, J.

The two prisoners, Frederick Walter Hadwen and Alfred Ingram, were jointly indicted at the assizes held for the West Riding of the county of York at Leeds and tried on the 14th and 15th of March, 1902, upon an indictment whereby they were jointly charged in thirty counts with the following: (a) Offences under the Debtors Act, 1869, s. 11, sub-section 10, in making and being privy to the making of certain false entries in a document relating to their affairs—namely, a certain balance sheet within four months before the presentation of a bankruptcy petition by them with intent to conceal the state of their affairs; (b) offences under section 13 of the same Act by obtaining credit under false pretences in incurring a debt to the Halifax and Huddersfield Union Banking Co.; (c) conspiring together to cheat and defraud the said banking company.

The prisoners had for many years carried on business as silk spinners under the style of Hadwen & Sons, at Triangle, near Halifax. Prisoners pleaded "Not guilty," and were separately defended by counsel. Upon the close of the case for the Crown each prisoner gave evidence exculpating himself, and against the other prisoner. Counsel on behalf of each prisoner then claimed the right to cross-examine the other prisoner, but counsel for the Crown contended that such cross-examination was not permissible. The judge upheld the contention, and excluded all cross-examination of one prisoner on behalf of the other, but agreed to state a case for the opinion of the High Court. The jury found both prisoners guilty upon all the counts, and the judge respited the sentences, and let the prisoners out on bail to appear at the next general gaol delivery of the county of York if called upon.

The question reserved for the opinion of the court was whether counsel for one prisoner was or was not entitled to cross-examine the other prisoner upon the evidence given by the latter against him.

If the learned judge was right in excluding such cross-examination the conviction was to be affirmed; otherwise it was to be quashed.

Tindal Atkinson, K.C. (Waugh with him), for the prisoner Hadwen.—Before the passing of the Criminal Evidence Act, 1898, a statement not on oath by one prisoner was not evidence against another prisoner, because it could not be cross-examined to. But if a witness was called by one prisoner whose evidence tended to incriminate another prisoner, he could be cross-examined: Reg. v. Woods, 6 Cox Cr. Cas. 224; Reg. v. Burditt, 6 Cox Cr. Cas. 458, and in civil cases one co-defendant could cross-examine another co-defendant: Allen v. Allen, 42 W. R. 549, [1894] P. 248; Lord v. Colvin, 3 W. R. 342, 3 Drew. 222. By section 1 of the Criminal Evidence Act, 1898, it was provided that "every person charged with an offence, and the wife or husband, as the case might be, of the person so charged shall be a competent witness for the defence at every stage of the proceedings." Sub-section (f) provides that a person charged with an offence and called as a witness shall not be required to answer any question tending to show that he has been previously charged with any offence or that he was of bad character; but there were certain exceptions given, and amongst these exceptions was this one: "Unless the defence is such as to involve imputations on the character of the prosecutor or the witnesses for the prosecution, or he has given evidence against any person charged with the same offence." This showed clearly that the Act contemplated that a prisoner who gave evidence against his co-prisoner might be cross-examined as to his previous character. This shows clearly that counsel for the prisoner incriminated by the evidence given on behalf of another prisoner was entitled to cross-examine such a witness on behalf of his client, and in the present case for this court to hold otherwise would be calculated to defeat the ends of justice.

Scott Fox, K.C. (R. A. Shepherd with him), for the prisoner Ingram.—The statute admits of no doubt that when a prisoner gives evidence against a fellow prisoner he forfeits the protection which the Act gives him in respect to cross-examination as to previous character. Obviously the ends of justice would be best served if the prisoner who was attacked was allowed an opportunity of disproving the charge made against him. The ruling of the learned judge was wrong and the conviction should be quashed.

Reg. v. Martin, 17 Cox. Cr. Cas. 36, was also referred to.

[KENNEDY, J.—The whole scheme of the Act is to provide for the right to cross-examination. "A person," the section 1 (f) says, "charged and called as a witness shall not be asked, or if asked shall not be required to answer, any question tending to show that he has committed or been convicted of or been charged with any offence other than that wherewith he is then charged, or is of bad character unless (sub-section 2) he has personally or by his advocate asked questions of the witnesses for the prosecution with a view to establish his own good character, or the nature or conduct of the defence is such as to involve imputations on the character of the prosecutor or witnesses for the prosecution, or (sub-section 3) he has given evidence against any person charged with the same offence." In my opinion the Act confers on the prisoner as well as on the prosecutor or witnesses for the prosecution the right of testing the truth of any imputation made against him.]

Harold Thomas (Milvain, K.C., with him), for the prosecution.—The policy of the Act is to enable a prisoner to be a competent witness for the defence, and the contention that one prisoner may be cross-examined by another involves the contrary assumption,—namely, that he may be a witness for the prosecution. That is why cross-examination by the other prisoner was permitted in Reg. v. Woods and Reg. v. Burditt, the court there treating the evidence as evidence in support of the prosecution. But a prisoner can only be cross-examined by counsel for the prosecution. [KENNEDY, J.—Why, in common justice, should not the person most interested in testing the truth of the imputation not be allowed to cross-examine?] That it is so is to be gathered from the wording of the Act. Where prisoners are jointly indicted and one on examination by the other becomes "hostile," the other should apply for leave to cross-examine him on the ground of hostility, but there is nothing in the wording of the Act which gives him leave to cross-examine him as of right.

Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J.—If the matter had not been pressing, having regard to the general importance of the case, we would have taken time to consider our judgment, but as it is of importance that judgment should be given early, we think it better to express our opinion now. Before we consider how far the principle of the question is covered by authority I think it is important to point out that if the statute does not prevent such a cross-examination it would obviously be in the interests of justice that the other prisoner's counsel should be allowed to cross-examine. I have no doubt in the great majority of cases counsel for the prosecution would test the evidence of the prisoner with a view of eliciting the truth, but of course there might be a case in which the evidence at the disposal of the prosecution was very strong against the second prisoner, and therefore the prosecution might not think it their duty to cross-examine so strictly as the counsel who appeared for the other prisoner. But in addition, inasmuch as the evidence given by the prisoner who had elected to give evidence might start some entirely new point, or deal with some matter of which counsel for the prosecution might have had no notice, it is probable that the instructions which the other prisoner had given or could give to his counsel might be much more effective material for cross-examining the prisoner who had given evidence and eliciting the truth, than the cross-examination of the prosecuting counsel. Therefore on principle, and in the interests of justice, where evidence is given before the jury which might be treated as evidence against a man, one would wish that every opportunity of cross-examining and testing that evidence should be given.

I think it is convenient to consider how the law stood before the passing of the Act of 1898. It has been decided in two cases reported in Cox's Criminal Cases, that where one prisoner called witnesses for his own defence, and those witnesses implicated or gave evidence against the other prisoner, counsel for the second prisoner so implicated had special rights and was allowed to cross-examine them. In the case of Reg. v. Wood, two prisoners were indicted for manslaughter, and the counsel for one of them having addressed the jury, counsel for the second prisoner did the same and then called witnesses for the defence whose evidence tended to shew negligence on the part of the first prisoner, and it was held that the counsel for the first prisoner had the right to cross-examine the witnesses called by the second prisoner, and then to address the jury a second time confining his speech to comments on the evidence which the second prisoner had adduced against the prisoner for whom he appeared. In Reg. v. Burditt it was expressly decided that where two prisoners were indicted jointly and witnesses were called by one of them to incriminate the other, that the latter had a right to re-examine those witnesses. The reasoning of Jervis, C.J., in the latter case affords considerable assistance to us in coming to a conclusion in this case. And it is clear that as the law stood at that time, that the right to cross-examine depended upon the fact whether the witnesses for the prisoner A had given evidence against prisoner B. That being the existing state of the law the Criminal Evidence Act of 1898 was passed to enable prisoners to give evidence on their own behalf, and it recognized very properly that prisoners could not be called without their own consent. Therefore one is not surprised to find in the first section the words "every person charged with an offence . . . shall be a competent witness for the defence at every stage of the proceedings, whether such person is charged solely or jointly with any other person. Provided as follows: (a) A person so charged shall not be called as a witness in pursuance of this Act except upon his own application." I think that it occurred to the Legislature that a case might arise of joint prisoners and of evidence being given which would attack other persons, and accordingly sub-section (f) limited the right to cross-examine—perhaps too much so—except in certain events.

Now, the most common and ordinary case of a person giving evidence against some other person charged with the same offence would be where several prisoners were indicted together for the same offence, though there was the probability of the offence having been the subject of other proceedings—but, speaking for myself, unless it were intended to exclude from the provisions of sub-section 3 of section (f) what I will call the most ordinary cases of two or more persons being indicted jointly for the same offence, each one of them endeavouring to shift the guilt on to the shoulders of another person, it seems to me exactly the case where general cross-examination ought to be allowed.

But then it is said, it still must be general cross-examination by the prosecuting counsel, and not by counsel for the other prisoners, and it is in that respect that I think the analogy of the judgment and reasoning of the judgment to which I have called attention is of material assistance. Jervis, C.J., and the whole Court of Crown Cases Reserved thought that the reason why the cross-examination should be allowed would be that in effect and in substance the prisoner had given evidence of which the prosecution could avail themselves. That being so, although I agree that the witness was originally called for the defence, yet in fact the witness having given evidence against the other prisoner, I think the witness would be relied on by the prosecution as supporting the case against the other prisoner, or might be.

I come to the conclusion, therefore, both on principle and applying the analogy of previous decisions before the Act that a witness who gave evidence hostile to the defendant did become a witness for the Crown and had in the terms of the section become a witness giving evidence against the person charged with the same offence, and therefore I think such witness ought to be allowed to be cross-examined by the counsel for the other prisoner.

For these reasons the ruling of the learned judge is, in my opinion, wrong, and the appeal must be allowed and the conviction quashed.

LAWRANCE, J.—I am of the same opinion.

WRIGHT, J.—I agree. I can find nothing in the Act except section 1 (f) (iii.) which tends to abrogate the ordinary common law rule laid down in Reg. v. Payne, 20 W. R. 390, L. R. 1 C. C. R. 349; and Allen v. Allen, 42 W. R. 230, [1894], P. 248, at p. 253, that evidence of one defendant cannot on a criminal trial be received as evidence either for or against another defendant, the reason being that otherwise there would be a great danger that one defendant would be tempted to exculpate himself at the expense of his co-defendant. I had some doubt whether clause (f) (iii.) does get over the difficulty, but I think that it can be construed as dealing with evidence given by one prisoner not only in his own defence, but also with the object of making a case against the other prisoner. If that is so, and I am not disposed to decide otherwise, it follows that there may be cross-examination of the one prisoner by the other.

BRUCE, J.—I agree with the Lord Chief Justice for the reasons which he has given.

KENNEDY, J.—I also agree with the judgment of my lord.

IN BANKRUPTCY.

Ex parte THE TRUSTEE v. WARD. (a.)

Bankruptcy—Pledge—Property of bankrupt—Relation back of trustee's title—Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52), s. 44.

A pledgee of goods is bound to return the goods to the pledgor when paid the amount advanced upon them, even though he has notice that the pledgor has committed an act of bankruptcy within three months prior to the date of such return of the goods.

Motion by the trustee in the bankruptcy of Lawford & Lawrence (1) for a declaration that certain cabs delivered by the respondent Ward to the bankrupts on the 26th of October, 1900, formed part of the property of the bankrupts passing to the trustee and had been delivered to the bankrupts after the respondent had had notice of an act of bankruptcy; (2) for a similar declaration as to certain cabs delivered to the bankrupts by the respondent on the 11th of January, 1901, two days after the making of the receiving order and after the respondent had had notice of the receiving order. The notice of motion further asked for an order that Ward should pay to the trustee the difference between the value of the cabs and the amount which the respondent had lent the bankrupts upon them.

The first lot of cabs had been deposited by the bankrupts with Ward to secure an advance of £435 upon the 14th of September, 1900.

The second lot were similarly deposited to secure £120 upon the 27th of September, 1900.

Upon the 26th of October, 1900, the bankrupts repaid the first advance and the respondents delivered the first lot of cabs to them.

They had at this date committed an act of bankruptcy by suffering seizure of their goods and sale of the same upon the 6th of October.

Upon the 9th of January, 1901, a receiving order was made against them, and on the 11th of January they repaid the second loan and the respondent delivered the second lot of cabs to them.

The bankrupts disposed of the cabs for their own purposes before the trustee could intervene, and their value was consequently lost to the estate.

The motion came on for hearing on the 9th of June, when viva voce evidence was taken which satisfied the court that Ward had notice of the act of bankruptcy of the 6th of October when he delivered the first lot of cabs to the bankrupts, and of the receiving order when he delivered the second lot.

The case then stood over for further argument.

June 12.—Muir Mackenzie and S. G. Lushington, for the respondent, argued that Ward, as pledgee, could not have refused to return the goods when paid the money advanced upon them.

They cited Biddle v. Bond, 13 W. R. 561, 6 B. & S. 225; Cannan v. South-Eastern Railway, 7 Exch. 843; Knowles v. Horsfall, 5 B. & Ald. 134.

Carrington and Frank Mellor, for the trustee, contended that as the trustee's title related back to the act of bankruptcy of the 6th of October, that the respondent was not protected by section 49 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, and the trustee was entitled to recover the value of the goods. The respondent had delivered them to the bankrupts at his own risk.

They cited Vernon v. Hankey, 2 T. R. 113; Foster v. Allanson, 2 T. R. 479; Thorne v. Tilbury, 3 H. & N. 534, 7 W. R. C. L. Dig. 64; Rogers v. Lambert, 38 W. R. 542, 24 Q. B. D. 573; In re Pollitt, Ex parte Minor, 41 W. R. 276, [1893] 1 Q. B. 455; and In re Lowe, Ex parte Lowe, 38 W. R. 560, 7 Morr. 25.

WRIGHT, J.—In this case the trustee's title undoubtedly related back to the 6th of October, 1900, and the respondent knowing of the act of bankruptcy of that date was not protected by section 49 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883. Still, though with great doubt, I think he is not liable to the trustee for the value of these goods. It seems to me that though it is true that the trustee's title related back to the act of bankruptcy of the 6th of October, yet that he took that title and interest subject to the contract of pledge under which Ward held the cabs. Ward committed no wrong, he was guilty of no conversion, he did not retain any property, nor receive any money to the use of the bankrupts. He had no option but to return the cabs when the money was paid; it would have been illegal and wrong, both to the bankrupts and to the trustees through the bankrupts if he had refused to give them up. I think that the case of Vernon v. Hankey is not in point, and that my judgment must be for the respondent.

Application dismissed.

Bankruptcy—Private examination of witness in foreign country—Jurisdiction—Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52), ss. 27, 105, 118.

The Court has no power under section 27 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, to make an order for the private examination of witnesses in a foreign country.

Ex parte application on behalf of the trustee in the bankruptcy for an order for the private examination of witnesses at Zurich, in Switzerland.

The bankrupt was a naturalized British subject. He had failed to surrender himself for public examination, had gone abroad, and refused to give the trustee any information about his affairs. His mother, who was a foreign subject, had lodged a proof in the bankruptcy for £10,000, which was rejected by the trustee. She lodged an appeal against the decision of the trustee supported by her affidavit. She refused to come to England to be cross-examined on her affidavit at the hearing of the appeal and applied for the appointment of a special examiner to take her evidence at Zurich, and on the 16th of May an order was made appointing a special examiner.

The trustee thereupon applied under section 27 for an order for the examination of the bankrupt and his brother before the same examiner, as it appeared probable that they would be with their mother at the date fixed for her examination.

A. H. Carrington, for the trustee.—I submit that the court has power to make this order under the terms of sub-section 6 of section 27: "The court may, if it think fit, order that any person who, if in England, would be liable to be brought before it under this section, shall be examined in Scotland or Ireland, or in any other place out of England." If, however, the court should entertain any doubt as to its jurisdiction, I should ask for an order for the examination of such persons as may be willing to submit themselves for examination.

(a.) Reported by P. M. FRANCKE, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

(a.) Reported by P. M. FRANCKE, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

WRIGHT, J.—As at present advised I am of opinion that under section 27 I have no power to make the order asked for. Although the words of sub-section 6 of that section are primâ facie wide enough to include a place not within the British dominions, yet they must be construed as limited to the British dominions. It seems to me, although I have not had an opportunity of fully considering it, that that restriction is primâ facie necessary. It is impossible to suppose the section to mean that the court is to have compulsory power in France or Germany. I cannot compel these persons to come up for examination, nor could I punish them if they refused to come, or came and would not answer. Moreover, it is not even shown that they are in Switzerland, where it is desired to examine them. I regret I cannot make the order. Nor can I make it in the optional form that they should be examined if they think fit to submit. I do not think that is within the function of the court or the kind of thing the section intended at all.

Application refused.

Inland revenue—Income tax—Interest arising from foreign securities—Receipt in United Kingdom—Profit and loss—Income Tax Act. 1842 (5 & 6 Vict. c. 35), s. 100, Schedule D, Fourth Case.

The income tax assessed under the Fourth Case of section 100, Schedule D, of the Income Tax Act, 1842, in respect of interest arising from foreign securities which have been or will be received in Great Britain in the current year without any deduction or abatement, should be charged only on the amount of such interest actually received in this country.

Decision of the Court of Appeal ([1901] 1 Q. B. 153, 49 W. R. Dig. 77) reversed.

This was an appeal from a decision of the Court of Appeal (A.L. Smith, M.R., and Collins and Stirling, L.JJ.), affirming that of Darling and Phillimore, JJ.

The question in dispute was as to whether the society was to be assessed on the amount of interest on foreign investment actually received in this country, or on the amount set out in their accounts of the profit and loss for the year.

The respondent assessed the appellants for the year ending the 5th of April, 1893, as being liable to income tax on a sum of £143,483 7s. 3d. The commissioners claimed that the appellants were liable to pay income tax on the gross amount received by them, whether in Great Britain or abroad. The appellants contended that they were only liable under Case 4, section 100, of 5 & 6 Vict. c. 35, to pay income tax on such part of the interest derived by them from the funds invested in foreign securities as was actually received by them in Great Britain during the year of account. The commissioners held that the said interest was "constructively remitted" to Great Britain and was assessable.

The facts are more particularly referred to in Lord Lindley's judgment.

It was held by the Court of Appeal that the interest was received in the United Kingdom within the meaning of the Fourth Case of section 100 of 5 & 6 Vict. c. 35.

Sir Edward Clarke, K.C., and Haldane, K.C. (Stewart-Smith with them), for the appellants.

THE HOUSE took time for consideration.

Earl of HALSBURY, L.C.—The question in this case seems to me to depend upon the actual words used by the Legislature, and I deprecate a construction which passes by the actual words and seeks to limit the words by what is supposed to be something equivalent to the language used by the Legislature. To put the matter shortly, the Legislature has provided that, besides the proper amount of taxation upon the balance of profits and gains by any person resident in this country, he must also pay upon the interest on any investment made in foreign countries, and that, in calculating that amount, the actual amount received on such investments, no calculation or deduction is to be allowed as to the expenses of obtaining such investment, but the duty must be levied upon the actual amount received; but then this impost is only to be levied provided the money is received in this country.

Now, here the money has not actually been received in this country. It is to be observed that the Legislature has assumed, by the distinction which it has made between the mode of ascertaining the amount payable generally upon the balance of gains and profits and the amount taxable in respect of the interest payable upon foreign investments, that it has earmarked that sum and made it subject to distinct and peculiar incidents. The difficulty of identifying the actual sum is no limit on the enactment. The Legislature must be supposed to have contemplated the possibility of drawing a distinction between money received in this country and money accounted for or credited in account. If it were not for the difficulty of earmarking money, I should think no one would have any doubt that the money must be received in this country to bring it within the words of the statute. If it were not money, but some commodity—say tobacco—which a trader carrying on business in London and Paris was accounting for to his London house, no one would say that, though the Paris tobacco was credited in account as a set-off against some expense, or something that the supposed London firm had to set off against the same claim, and that, as the London firm was paid by the Paris tobacco, therefore the tobacco was liable to the import duty on tobacco because it was taken into account in the books of the London firm.

In no way that I can give any reasonable interpretation to has the money reached this country or been received in this country. It, like the tobacco in the case suggested, has not been imported; and if the Legislature had intended that bringing it into account was to be equivalent to its being received, it would have been easy to say so. It cannot be said that the use of artificial meanings to be attached to ordinary language is either unknown or unusual in legislation; and if it was intended to make this special subject of taxation to be taxed whenever and wherever an equivalent amount was credited or booked, or in any other way recognized as having come under the dominion of the owner in this country, nothing could have been easier than to enact it in plain terms.

I decline to go beyond the words used, and I do not think this money was received in this country.

I do not think any amount of book-keeping or treatment of these assets, wherever they may be, will be equivalent or the same thing as receiving the amount in this country. The words are simple, intelligible, and represent an ordinary and simple thing. I cannot think we ought to go beyond the words themselves, and I think this judgment ought to be reversed.

Lord MACNAGHTEN.—I am also of opinion that the judgment of the Court of Appeal cannot be supported.

The question depends upon the meaning of the rule applicable to the Fourth Case of Schedule D. To my mind, the language of the rule is so plain that it is difficult, if not impossible, to add anything which would make the meaning plainer.

The appellants are possessed of foreign securities. The duty to be charged in respect of interest arising from foreign securities is, according to the rule in question, to be computed on a sum not less than the full amount of the sums which have been, or will be, received in the United Kingdom in the current year. I do not understand what is meant by constructive receipt in such a case as this, or how any sums can be said to have been received in the United Kingdom unless they have been brought to the United Kingdom, or unless there has been a remittance "payable in the United Kingdom," to borrow the language of the rule applicable to the Fifth Case. The circumstance that the business of the society is "one indivisible business," and that the society in the statement of its affairs and in its dealings with its shareholders and customers takes into consideration its foreign assets and liabilities, seems to me to be immaterial to the present question. As my noble and learned friend Lord Robertson, when Lord President, observed in the case of Forbes v. Scottish Provident Institution, 33 Scot. L. R. 228, 3 Tax. Cas. 443, "Every man and every company having foreign or colonial investments of course knows of the interest arising from them, takes note of it, and enters it in any statement of affairs which may require to be made up." But that is, as I think, and as the Lord President thought, a very different thing from bringing the interest home—a very different thing from the receipt of the money here, either in specie or as represented by a remittance payable in this country.

The difficulty seems to have arisen from a misunderstanding or a misapplication of the judgment in the Scottish Mortgage Co. of New Mexico v. M'Kelvie, 2 Tax. Cas. 165. That was a very special case. Whether the decision was right or wrong it can have no bearing upon the question now before your lordships. Speaking for myself, I think the decision was right. In that case, as it seems to me, in the transmission to this country of money which the company was free to distribute, and the transmission to America by way of exchange of an equivalent amount which the company were bound to re-invest, the company acted as their own bankers, and did for themselves, by an entry in their books, what might have been done less conveniently and less economically by an ordinary bank or financial agent on their behalf.

I think that the appeal must be allowed.

Lord SHAND.—I am also of opinion that the appeal should be allowed. It is true that the appellants received the interest on their foreign securities by the hands of their agents abroad. But I think it is equally true that, as they left that interest where it was gained, it was never received in this country. When it was entered in the company's balance-sheet in order to the ascertainment of the profits of the year, it was so entered as estate which had not been received in England, but as property belonging to the company which they had acquired abroad, which had not been brought home or received here, but which was part of their foreign assets. Money or securities in that position was properly taken into account in the ascertainment of the year's profits, not because it had been received in England, but because, although not so received, it was part of assets of value which the company had acquired and held abroad.

In the Scottish case of Scottish Mortgage Co. of New Mexico v. McKelvie the species facti was different, for there the company treated the money as received in this country, and merely saved themselves the expense of cross-remittances. It appeared there that the company was not entitled to divide the money earned abroad unless it was received as profits in this country. It was treated as so received merely to avoid the expense and inconvenience of cross-remittances—money sent home and the same amount sent back by cross-cheques or drafts. That was a material point in the decision of the case, as showing that the money had been really received in this country.

Lord BRAMPTON.—It is conceded that no part of the money in question was ever received in the United Kingdom in specie, or in any form known to the commercial world for the transmission of money from one country or place to another. But it was argued that, if not actually, it was "constructively" so received in the accounts of the society. I confess I do not like that expression, nor do I quite understand what it means. If a "constructive" is the same thing as an actual receipt, I see no reason for the use of the word "constructive" at all. If it means something differing from or short of an actual receipt, then it seems to me that a constructive receipt is not recognized by the statute, which, in using the word "received" alone, must be taken to have used it having regard to its ordinary acceptation.

The Master of the Rolls (Sir A. L. Smith), in his judgment in the Court of Appeal, while stating that there must be "an actual receipt of the amount," added "but that receipt need not be in specie, it may be in account," and he then proceeded to deal with the accounts of the appellants, set forth in the appendix, and to draw from them the inference that the appellants had actually received and dealt with these foreign dividends in the United Kingdom, and had distributed them as having been so received. Now I am not prepared to deny that accounts may be so worded as to contain admissions justifying such an inference, but I differ with the view he took that such admissions, or anything approaching them, are to be found in the accounts before your lordships.

Those accounts were framed partly to satisfy the requirements of the Life Insurance Companies Act, 1870 (33 & 34 Vict. c. 61), that at the end of each financial year a statement of the company's revenue account and of its balance-sheet in the forms contained in the 1st and 2nd schedules should be furnished to the Board of Trade; and partly in obedience to articles 77 and 78 of the society's deed of settlement, directing books to be kept in which full entries shall be made of all matters which shall properly be the subject of debt or credit account, so that the financial state of the company may at all times appear as accurately as circumstances will permit; and further directing balance-sheets to be made up yearly and sent to every shareholder. The accounts before your lordships profess to do no more than this, and no inference of fact can be drawn from them other than, or in addition to, those stated in them.

In my opinion, there is a total absence of any evidence to justify a finding that the interest in question has ever been received in the United Kingdom.

For the Crown the case of Scottish Mortgage Co. of New Mexico v. McKelvie was much relied on. I am not satisfied with the correctness of the judgment in that case. But assuming it to be sound, it was distinguishable from the present, for in paragraph 13 of the printed case before the Court of Session there was an admission that the income charged with income tax had been applied in payment of interest and dividends to debenture and share holders in Glasgow. No similar admission was contained in the case before this House.

The appeal should be allowed with costs.

Lord LINDLEY.—This appeal turns upon the answer to be given to a simple question of fact. Has a certain sum of money entered by the Gresham Society in its accounts as an asset been received in this country by the society, or has it not? If it has, the appeal ought to be dismissed; on the other hand, if it has not, the appeal ought to be allowed.

First let us consider what is meant by the receipt of a sum of money.

I agree with the Court of Appeal that a sum of money may be received in more ways than one—for example, by the transfer of coin or of a negotiable instrument or other document which represents and produces coin and is treated as such by business men. Even a settlement in account may be equivalent to a receipt of a sum of money, although no money may pass; and I am not myself prepared to say that what amongst business men is equivalent to a receipt of a sum of money is not a receipt within the meaning of the statute which your lordships have to interpret. But to constitute a receipt of anything there must be a person to receive and a person from whom he receives it, and something received by the former from the latter, and in this case that something must be a sum of money. A mere entry in an account which does not represent such a transaction, does not prove any receipt, whatever else it may be worth.

Now in this case the Gresham Co.'s accounts and the statements in the special case clearly establish the fact that the sum of £143,483, sought to be charged with income tax, consists of interest and dividends received abroad by the agents of the company from persons abroad who had paid those agents. The case and accounts do not state the exact mode in which the various sums making up the total of £143,483 were paid to the agents of the company. The payment is admitted, and the receipt of that sum by the company, through its agents, is not in dispute.

But then comes the second question, Has that sum been received in this country by the Gresham Co.? The special case clearly shows that it has not in fact been remitted to this country in any way whatever. Applying the test already suggested, no one here has received that sum; the agents who received it abroad still have it abroad, or have dealt with it otherwise than by sending it to the company here. No account even is forthcoming to show that the sum has ever been treated as remitted here so as to justify the inference that in any commercial sense the sum has been received in the United Kingdom as distinguished from other countries.

What has been done, and all that has been done, is that the Gresham Co., in making up its accounts with a view to ascertain what profits it could divide in a particular year, entered on its asset side the sum of £143,483 as money received during the year. This was obviously right; for the object was not to ascertain the profit made in any particular country, but the profit made by the company on all its transactions all over the world. The company has paid duty on the profit so ascertained, and no question arises as to that. But when required to pay duty on the item of £143,483, on the ground that this sum is made up of interest or dividends received in the United Kingdom, the company objects on the ground that it represents nothing of the sort. Nor does it, in truth.

The fact that the profits shown by the account have been divided amongst the shareholders of the company does not carry the case any further. No part of the £143,483 has come over here, or been in any sense received here, and then applied in payment of dividend. Some interest of dividends received abroad have been remitted here and duty has been paid on them accordingly, but the special case shows plainly that no part of the £143,483 has been so remitted, either for the purpose of paying dividend or for any other purpose.

It must be assumed that the language used by the Legislature in laying down the rules to be observed in the various cases contained in the Income Tax Act, 1842, was carefully chosen, and that there was some good and sufficient reason for confining the duty on interest on foreign securities (mentioned in the Fourth Case falling under Schedule D) to sums which have been or will be received in Great Britain during the year for which the duty is payable. The locality of the receipt is made all-important, and it is only by ignoring it, or by introducing the expression "constructive receipt"—which may mean anything—that the claim of the Crown can be supported.

Schedule D in the Act of 1842 was re-cast in 1853, and was replaced by a new Schedule D; but the cases and rules in the Act of 1842 are applicable to the new schedule: see sections 2 and 5 of the Income Tax Act, 1853.

Authorities have been referred to, and especially the Scotch cases of Scottish Mortgage Co. of New Mexico v. McKelvie; Forbes v. Scottish Provident Institution, 33 Scot. L. R. 228, 3 Tax. Cas. 443; and the Standard Life Assurance Co. v. Allan, 3 Ct. Sess. Cas. 5th Ser. 805. McKelvie's case was very peculiar. Money received by the company's agents abroad was clearly and unmistakably treated by the company as remitted to and received by it here, and money here was treated by the company as remitted abroad in exchange for it. The exchange was effected by a book entry, but that entry was the business mode of carrying out cross-remittances which it would have been unbusiness-like and really childish to have effected in any other way. But thinking as I do that McKelvie's case may be properly upheld, I am not prepared to adopt it as a new starting-point for further inferences. The language of the statute is the true starting-point in each case. Forbes's case and the Standard Life Assurance Co.'s case were both based on this sound principle, and were in my opinion both clearly rightly decided. The Court of Appeal, in my opinion, considered this case undistinguishable from McKelvie's, but I am unable so to regard it. Assuming them to be undistinguishable, it would, in my opinion, be more correct to overrule McKelvie's case than to decide the present appeal in favour of the Crown.

In my opinion the appeal should be allowed.

MARSHALL v. RUDEFORTH. (a.)

Master and servant—Employer's liability—Accident—Compensation—Building—"Scaffolding"—Roof of building being repaired by a ladder resting against parapet—Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897 (60 & 61 Vict. c. 37), s. 7, sub-section 1.

A workman was employed to repair the roof of a building exceeding thirty feet in height. To do the work he used a ladder, one end of which was on the pavement and the other rested on the parapet at the top of the house. There was no second ladder, crawling board, or other contrivance on the roof. The applicant was injured while carrying slates up the ladder for use on the roof.

Held, that the county court judge was entitled to find as a fact that the ladder was not "scaffolding" within the meaning of section 7 of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, and therefore that the Act did not apply.

This was an appeal by a workman from a decision of the learned judge of the Scarborough County Court, who had refused to award him compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897.

The accident was caused by the slipping up of a ladder while the applicant was carrying some slates to be used for repairing the roof of the house. In order that the workman might get on the roof the ladder had been placed against the house, one end resting on the pavement and the other leaning on the parapet which ran round the top of the house.

It was admitted that the respondent was the "undertaker" within the meaning of section 7 of the Act, and that the house exceeded thirty feet in height, and that he would be liable to compensate the workman for the injuries he had received if the house was "being repaired by means of a scaffold" within the meaning of sub-section 1 of that section.

The learned county court judge held as a matter of fact that the ladder was not a "scaffolding," and that the applicant therefore could not claim compensation. From that decision the workman appealed, on the ground that the learned judge had misdirected himself.

Longstaffe, for the workman.—The Act speaks of a building being repaired by means of "scaffolding." The term is general and means any contrivance placed against the wall of a building for the purpose of enabling a workman to reach that part of the building upon which he is to work. If the ladder had been a temporary erection of two scaffold poles with boards lashed across, it would have been unquestionably a scaffold. The ladder that was used was simply a portable scaffold, and no logical distinction can be drawn between a scaffold which in the form of a ladder can be quickly put up and taken away and a scaffold which is made by fastening loose boards together for the occasion: Wood v. Walsh, 47 W. R. 504, [1899] 1 Q. B. 1009; Maude v. Brooke, 48 W. R. 290, [1900] 1 Q. B. 575; Hoddinott v. Newton, Chambers, & Co., 49 W. R. 380, [1901] A. C. 49, were cited.

Ruegg, K.C., for the respondent, was not heard.

COLLINS, M.R.—In this case I am unable to see that the learned county court judge has misdirected himself. He had all the facts before him and he found as a fact that the ladder in the circumstances did not constitute a scaffold, and we cannot interfere with his finding of fact unless we can hold that every ladder is primâ facie a scaffold within the meaning of the word as used in the Act of 1897. The admitted facts show that the house in question was over thirty feet in height, and that the roof was being repaired by means of a ladder, and that the workman therefore met with the accident while employed on, in, or about a building under circumstances which, if the ladder is a scaffold, would entitle him to compensation. The important and only question we have to decide is whether this ladder used by itself amounts in law to a scaffold. The decisions in the House of Lords stop us from holding that in law a ladder by itself is a "scaffold," although I confess that after reading them most carefully I have been unable to formulate a definition to the word scaffolding that would cover the decisions and no more of the noble and learned lords. I do not think that as those decisions now stand any definition of a scaffold would necessarily exclude a ladder. But it is a very different thing to lay down that proposition and to lay down as a proposition, as we must do here, if we allow this appeal, that the word scaffolding must necessarily in law include a ladder. We cannot do that, and consequently we cannot say that the county court judge may not find, without misdirecting himself, that the ladder was not a scaffold.

The appeal therefore fails.

DUNHAM v. CLARE. (a.)

Master and servant—Employer's liability—Accident—Compensation—Death resulting from injury—Natural or probable consequence—Workmen's Compensation Act. 1897 (60 & 61 Vict. c. 37), s. 1, sub-section 1; Schedule I., 1 (a).

Where a workman sustains personal injury by accident arising out of and in the course of his employment and he subsequently dies, it is sufficient for the dependants who claim compensation to show that death in fact resulted from the injury; it is immaterial that death was not the natural or probable consequence of the injury.

Appeal from a decision of the judge of the Walsall County Court in an arbitration under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897.

The applicant for compensation was the widow of a workman who met with an accident in the course of his employment and subsequently died. The circumstances were as follows: On the 2nd of September, 1901, the deceased was carrying a heavy pipe up some steps, when the pipe slipped and fell upon his left foot and injured the little toe. He was taken to the hospital and attended to, and was treated as an outpatient for some days. On the 17th of September it was discovered that erysipelas had set in, and on the 27th of September he died. The evidence of the medical man who attended the deceased, and was called on his behalf, was that the cause of death was blood poisoning caused by erysipelas in the wound, the erysipelas being of an uncommon form. He admitted in cross-examination that erysipelas was not a necessary or a usual consequence of a wound of this kind. Medical evidence was given on behalf of the employer to the effect that erysipelas was a very unusual consequence of such a wound, that erysipelas was caused by introduction of germs only, and that it never supervened more than six, or at the most ten, days after the introduction of the germ.

The county court judge found and awarded that the applicant was not entitled to compensation, on the ground that death was not the result of an accident—i.e., not the natural or probable consequence of an accident.

The applicant appealed.

Ruegg, K.C., and R. J. Lawrence, for the applicant.—The county court judge did not find that death did not in fact result from the accident, but that it was not the natural or probable consequence of the accident. All that the statute requires is that death should result from the accidental injury: see Schedule I., par. 1 (a). Lloyd v. Sugg & Co., 48 W. R. 257, [1900] 1 Q. B. 481, shows that this was a case of an accident; and, if the man had not died, the employer could not have avoided paying compensation. The county court judge misdirected himself in asking whether death was the natural or probable consequence of the accident. It was suggested that there was a fresh accident—viz., the introduction of a germ, and that death resulted from that; but there was no evidence to support such a suggestion.

Disturnal, for the employer.—The finding of the county court judge ought not to be interfered with. It is consistent with the evidence that death was due to some cause which intervened after the accident which happened in the course of the man's employment.

He referred to Sharp v. Powell, 20 W. R. 584, L. R. 8 C. P. 253; Winspear v. Accident Insurance Co., 29 W. R. 116, 6 Q. B. D. 42; and Clark v. Chambers, 26 W. R. 613, 3 Q. B. D. 327.

COLLINS, M.R.—The ground of the appeal in this case is that the county court judge misdirected himself in holding that the death of the deceased was not the result of accident, which he explained to mean not the natural or probable consequence. The deceased met with an accident which caused injury to his toe, and for that injury he was treated, but subsequently erysipelas set in, and he died. I accept the view that at the time of the accident it was improbable that erysipelas would supervene, and perhaps unnatural to expect it. But the question is whether that is the right standard to apply in this case. In my opinion, when it is shown that, in the language of section 1 of the Act, personal injury by accident arising out of and in the course of his employment has been caused to a workman, and that, in the language of Schedule I., death has resulted from the injury, the applicant has done all the statute requires in order to be entitled to an award for compensation. If death in fact resulted, it does not matter how improbable it was that it should so result. The point is—did death result from the accident, or was the chain of causation broken by a novus actus interveniens, which gave a new origin to the after consequences? It seems to me to be important to notice that we are dealing here with an obligation created by an Act of Parliament, not with any liability arising out of breach of contract or tort. In cases of breach of contract it is clearly settled that the defendant is liable for the consequences which naturally followed from the breach. In cases of tort the liability is somewhat larger than in contract, but still it is measured by what might have been reasonably anticipated as probable. Both in contract and in tort the standard is—what was reasonably natural and probable. But here I think no such consideration arises. This Act imposes a liability which is entirely independent of negligence. Then has the county court judge applied the right standard in this case? In my opinion to ask whether the death was the natural or probable consequence of the accident was to apply a wrong standard. The fact that death has resulted is quite compatible with its being neither the natural nor the probable consequence. In this case death was the result of the accident, unless some new cause intervened. The applicant is therefore entitled to have an award made in her favour, unless there was some such novus actus interveniens. The case must go back to the arbitrator in order that that question may be determined.

FLETCHER v. LONDON UNITED TRAMWAYS (LIMITED). (a)

Master and servant—Employers' liability—Accident—Compensation—Engineering work—Railroad—Tramway—Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897 (60 & 61 Vict. c. 37), s. 7, sub-section 2.

The word "railroad" in the definition of "engineering work" in sub-section 2 of section 7 of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, is not limited in its meaning to a "railway" as defined in the same sub-section, but includes a tramway.

Appeal from a decision of the judge of the Brentford County Court in an arbitration under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897.

The applicant for compensation was a workman who had suffered personal injury by accident in the course of his employment. The work upon which the applicant was engaged at the time of the accident was the laying down by the respondent company of a line of rails on the Uxbridge High-road between Hanwell and Acton, on which it was intended to run electric cars. It appeared that the respondents had constructed a light railway along the road from Uxbridge to Hanwell, and desired to extend it from Hanwell to Acton. The necessary application for an order authorizing the construction of such an extension was made to the Light Railway Commissioners, by whom the proposal was submitted to Parliament, and in the result the London United Tramways Act, 1900, was passed, which authorized the respondents to make a tramway between Hanwell and Acton. This Act incorporated Parts II. and III. of the Tramways Act, 1870. The line from Uxbridge to Acton, when completed, formed a continuous electric line, the traffic being worked by overhead traction. The same carriages went from one end of the line to the other, and there was nothing to be seen by which anyone travelling on the line could tell when he left the light railway and came upon the tramway.

The question was whether the employment of the applicant was an employment to which the Workmen's Compensation Act applies.

Section 7, sub-section 1, enacts that the Act shall apply to employment by the undertakers on, in, or about (inter alia) a railway or engineering work. By sub-section 2, "railway" means the railway of any railway company to which the Regulation of Railways Act, 1873, applies, and includes a light railway made under the Light Railways Act, 1896; and "railway" and "railway company" have the same meaning as in the said Acts of 1873 and 1896; and "engineering work" means any work of construction or alteration or repair of a railroad, harbour, dock, canal, or sewer.

The county court judge held that the employment of the applicant was not within the Act, and dismissed the application for compensation. He was of opinion, first, that a tramway did not come within the definition of "railway" in sub-section 2; and secondly, that a tramway did not come within the definition of "engineering work," for the word "railroad" in that definition was synonymous with "railway."

The applicant appealed.

Compston, for the appellant.

Ruegg, K.C., and R. Pike Glasgow, for the respondents.

The case of Fullick v. Evans, 84 L. T. Rep. 413, 49 W. R. Dig. 113, was cited.

Collins, M.R.—I am of opinion that this appeal must be allowed. The applicant was at the time of the accident engaged in the work of constructing a part of a continuous electric line, which was subject to different statutory provisions at different parts of its length. One part of it was an electric light railway, another part of it was an ordinary electric tramway. That part of the system on which the applicant was at work was the tramway. The county court judge held that, having regard to the definition clause in the Act, the applicant's employment was not within the Act. It was sought to bring it within the Act as being employment either on a railway or on an engineering work. "Railway" is defined to mean the railway of any railway company to which the Regulation of Railways Act, 1873, applies, and to include a light railway made under the Light Railways Act, 1896. The county court judge held that the part of the system on which the applicant was working, not being the railway of a railway company, and not being a light railway, was outside the definition of "railway." I see no reason to differ from that. But then it was said that he was employed on an "engineering work," which is defined as including "any work of construction, or alteration, or repair of a railroad, harbour, dock, canal, or sewer." The Legislature have here introduced the word "railroad," a different word from "railway," which they had used before. There is no vehement presumption that the Legislature in this Act, when they use different words, mean the same thing. I think they might be entitled to the presumption that when they use different words they mean to express different things. The word "railroad" is clearly capable of including a tramway, and in itself it seems to be a good word for describing a tramway. Why should it not embrace a tramway for the purpose of bringing a tramway within the definition of "engineering work"? A tramway is only sought to be excluded from the definition by the suggestion that the Legislature, in using the word "railroad," must be taken as meaning the same thing as they had previously described as "railway." It seems to me to be clear that they intended to include a railway and something else, that they intended to mean something different from railway, not excluding it, but including a larger ambit. In my opinion the applicant was engaged on an engineering work within the definition—viz., on the construction of a railroad. Coming therefore primâ facie within the definition, and there being nothing to exclude him, he is within the Act and entitled to compensation.

Llewelyn v Washington. (a.)

Administration—Order of administration of assets—Insufficiency of personalty—Will—Secret trust of portion of residue—Specific gift debars the will.

A testatrix by her will gave her residuary estate to A., and by a memorandum not admissible to probate and subsequent to the date of the will, but which was acknowledged by A. to constitute a trust binding on her, gave a specific portion of the residue in trust for certain other persons therein specified. The residue, after deducting therefrom the portion bound by the memorandum, proved insufficient to pay the debts and testamentary expenses of the testatrix

Held, that the beneficiaries under the memorandum, though their title was dehors the will, were entitled to have the residuary personal estate not comprised in the memorandum exhausted to pay the debts and expenses before the property bound by the memorandum was resorted to, as if such property had been specifically bequeathed.

This was an appeal from a decision of Kekewich, J., (reported ante, p. 54, [1901] 2 Ch. 372).

By her will, dated the 11th of January, 1897, Sarah Maddock, spinster, appointed the plaintiff Llewelyn and the defendants Susan Washington and J. J. Maddock executors and trustees of her will; and after appointing a certain trust fund, over which she had a testamentary power of appointment, devised all her real estate and bequeathed all the residue of her personal estate to Susan Washington absolutely.

By a memorandum dated the 17th of January, 1897, signed by the testatrix (which Susan Washington admitted to constitute a valid trust), the testatrix requested that a certain person should receive half-yearly the interest arising from all the money she had saved "after being invested by my trustees." "This I leave with my will." And at the death of this person the property was to go to another named person. Susan Washington was witness to this memorandum. The testatrix died on the 14th of December, 1898, and on a summons taken out to determine the scope and effect of the memorandum it was declared that it bound all the testatrix's property at the date of her death except a certain freehold house, her furniture, farming stock, and household goods and effects, and the apportioned income to her death of certain trust funds of which she was tenant for life. It was found that the residuary personalty unaffected by the memorandum was insufficient to pay the debts, estate duty on the general personalty, and costs of administration; and on a summons taken out to determine (inter alia) out of what fund the deficiency ought to be borne and paid, Kekewich, J., held that, although the trust was specific, it was not a specific bequest, since the title of those claiming under it was dehors the will, and that the debts, duty, and costs were payable rateably out of the portion of residuary personalty bound by the memorandum and the portion not so bound.

The persons interested under the memorandum appealed. (There was no appeal on the question relating to the payment of estate duty on an appointed fund, also decided by his lordship.)

E. Ford, for the executors and trustees of the will.

Renshaw, K.C., and F. Vaughan Hawkins, for the appellant.—The fact that the trust is dehors the will does not affect the matter; effect must be given to it in the same way as if it were part of the will: Jones v. Badley, 16 W. R. 713, L. R. 3 Ch. App. 362. The beneficiaries under the memorandum are entitled to say that the property subject to it must be applied last unless the claims of creditors require otherwise.

They also cited or referred to Bothamley v. Sherson, 23 W. R. 848, L. R. 20 Eq. 304; McCormick v. Grogan, 17 W. R. 961, L. R. 4 H. L. 82; Tombs v. Roch, 2 Coll. C. Wms. 678.

Warrington, K.C., and T. H. Carson, K.C., for Susan Washington.—If the appellants are right in their contention that the memorandum must be treated as a specific bequest, no doubt they are right in contending that these sums must be paid primarily out of the residue not bound. We admit also that the terms of the memorandum would constitute a specific bequest if it were inserted in the will. But though Miss Washington is not entitled to take any personal benefit from the property bound by the memorandum, and the court will enforce the obligation imposed by it, there is no authority for the contention that the rest of the estate must be diminished for the benefit of those named in the memorandum, nor is this a fair construction of the testatrix's wishes. The cases cited on the other side are either not in point or else the trust was to pay a sum of money. In Drakeford v. Wilks the whole question was with regard to the specific gift, and this point therefore did not arise.

Vaughan Hawkins in reply.

Cur. adv. vult.

May 12.—The following judgments were delivered:

COLLINS, M.R., after stating the facts continued: The learned judge has arrived at this conclusion on the ground that, as stated by Lord Westbury in Cullen v. Attorney-General for Ireland, the obligation imposed by the memorandum is entirely dehors the will, and that it can therefore have no operation except upon such part of the residuary personal estate as comes to the hands of the legatee after the estate has been administered and all liabilities discharged in ordinary course without any regard whatever being had to the existence of the obligation created by the memorandum. It is obvious that if this view be right the obligation imposed on the conscience of the legatee by the memorandum might not come into operation at all until the greater part or even the whole of the fund made specifically subject to it had been exhausted, and that the person bound thereby would nevertheless be entitled to insist upon a mode of administration which for his own advantage might defeat the purpose of the testator in imposing the obligation. This would be a somewhat startling conclusion for that court to accept which long ago had found means, notwithstanding statutory difficulties, to reach the conscience of legatees and compel performance of trusts. Having taken so bold a step to compel justice to be done, it would be strange if it were compelled to admit its impotence to interfere until after its intervention had been futile, as it well might be, if the legatee were insolvent and dishonest. It seems that the precise point involved in this case has never been raised before and the question is whether the principle on which the court has intervened in similar cases to give effect to the intention of the testator is not large enough to cover it. The principle is well established and is expounded in numerous cases which were cited in argument, from Drakeford v. Wilks, decided by Lord Hardwicke in 1747, onwards, but it seems to be nowhere more clearly stated in recent times than by Lord Cairns in Jones v. Badley, adopting and enlarging the explanation given by Wood, V.C., in Wallgrave v. Tebbs.

It is not denied that, had the memorandum been actually added in the form of a codicil to the will its effect would have been that contended for by the appellants. The unappropriated residue of the personalty would have been applied first, and then the specific legatee under the codicil and Miss Washington as the specific devisee of the house would have contributed pro rata to the balance. The present case is free from the complication of any other legatee being concerned in the distribution. On what ground, then, must the court hold its hand and refrain from insisting on equity being done. The fact that the memorandum creates an obligation dehors the will and cannot be enforced as part of the will does not seem to me to be at all inconsistent with the right asserted by the court on the principle above stated to intervene to prevent an unrighteous insistance upon a primâ facie legal right. The court does not wait to give effect to an equity which displaces the Statute of Frauds until after the rights of the parties have been disposed of on the footing of the statute. So it seems to me to be wholly consistent with the admission that nothing dehors the will can be treated as part of the will that the court should intervene to prevent a legatee from committing a fraud by insisting on his rights under the will to the prejudice of his cestui que trust. Why should the court renounce its jurisdiction over the legatee to compel him to perform his trust because he is engaged in assisting at the distribution of assets under the will? He is not emancipated from its jurisdiction because he is engaged in that process, and the court will not. I should hope, be deterred from exercising this collateral jurisdiction by the fear that in so doing it may indirectly give effect to the well-ascertained intention of a testator not expressed on the face of the will, but not inconsistent with it. I think that the contention of the appellants must prevail, and that this appeal must be allowed.

STIRLING, L.J.—There can be no question that upon the principle stated by Lord Hatherley (then Wood, V.C.) in Wallgrave v. Tebbs in a passage quoted with approval by Lord Cairns in Jones v. Badley, Miss Washington is in equity subject to a personal obligation to dispose of the property mentioned in the memorandum of the 17th of June, 1897, in accordance with the directions therein contained. The precise nature and extent of the obligation must depend upon the true meaning and effect of that document. It was properly admitted at the bar that if the memorandum had been duly executed and admitted to probate as a codicil to the will, such property (which I will call the savings) would have been specifically bequeathed by the testatrix, and would consequently have been exempted from payment of funeral and testamentary expenses, debts, and legacies, if the personal estate not specifically bequeathed was sufficient to pay the charges. The principle of the exemption is (as pointed out by Lord Selborne in Robertson v. Broadbent, 32 W. R. 205, 8 App. Cas. 812, at p. 815) "that it is necessary to give effect to the intention apparent by the gift. If the bequest is of a particular chattel, such as a horse or a ship, it is manifest that the testator intended the thing itself to pass unconditionally, and in statu quo, to the legatee; which could not be if it were subject to the payment of funeral and testamentary expenses, debts, and pecuniary legacies. As against creditors the testator cannot wholly release it from liability for his debts; but as against all persons taking benefits under his will he may. The same principle applies to everything which a testator, identifying it by a sufficient description, and manifesting an intention that it should be enjoyed or taken in the state and condition indicated by that description, separates in favour of a particular legatee from the general mass of his personal estate, the fund out of which pecuniary legacies are in ordinary course payable. Inasmuch as the memorandum was not executed as a codicil, this reasoning cannot be applied without some qualification. If, for example, the testatrix had by her will made specific or pecuniary bequests, the legatees would have been entitled to say that their rights could not be affected by a document which did not satisfy the requirements of the Wills Act, and to insist that the estate should be administered (so far as they were concerned) without regard to it; and consequently the savings as well as the other property devised and bequeathed to Miss Washington would remain subject to those rights, as in any case all such property would be to the rights of creditors. But, as between Miss Washington and the beneficiaries under the memorandum, the savings have been separated from the general mass of the estate and made subject to the dispositions contained in the memorandum. Primâ facie, therefore, it seems to me that as between Miss Washington and those beneficiaries the principle laid down by Lord Selborne applies, and that the savings ought, as between that property and the other property given to her, to be held exempted from the charges which fall primarily on the personal estate not specifically bequeathed. The memorandum itself, when carefully examined, seems to me to contain much which serves to indicate that this was the intention of the testatrix. She states that she leaves the document "with her will"; she desires the fund to be invested by her trustees. In my opinion this indicates her meaning to be that the memorandum should (as between the beneficiaries themselves and Miss Washington) be taken as forming part of her testamentary dispositions, and that (as between the same parties) it should take effect as if it had been a duly executed codicil, and the like consequences as regards the administration of the estate must follow. Kekewich, J., has based his decision on the ground that the title of the beneficiaries under the memorandum was dehors the will. This is undoubtedly true, but it does not seem to me to conclude the case. If Miss Washington had died before the estate of the testatrix was fully administered and had made a will bequeathing the savings in the terms of the memorandum her legatees would have derived title dehors the will of the testatrix, but the case of Lady Langdale v. Briggs would, I think, have been, direct authority in favour of the exemption of the savings from the funeral and testamentary expenses and debts of the testatrix. In that case a testator specifically bequeathed certain leaseholds, which formed part of the general personal estate of a prior testatrix whose estate was not completely administered at the death of the testator, and it was contended that the leaseholds were subject to the payment of the funeral and testamentary expenses, debts, and legacies of the testatrix. Turner, L.J., says (8 De. G. M. & G. 391, at pp. 434-5): "It was . . . insisted that the whole or some part of the funeral and testamentary expenses, debts, and legacies . . . ought to be made good out of these leasehold estates. But as to the funeral and testamentary expenses, debts, and legacies there were other assets . . . out of which they could be and were ultimately paid. And surely if these leaseholds were well bequeathed by the will of the testator it was the duty of his executors to take care that they were not unnecessarily sold for the purpose of making these payments." So here it seems to me that Miss Washington came under an obligation to take care that (as between herself and the beneficiaries under the memorandum) the savings were not unnecessarily resorted to for the purpose of answering the funeral and testamentary expenses and debts of the testatrix. Finally I may observe that the view which I have taken does not conflict with any decision and is in accordance with what was done by Lord Alvanley, M.R., in Barrow v. Greenough, and by James, V.C., in Irvine v. Sullivan. For these reasons I think that the appeal ought to be allowed.

COZENS-HARDY, L.J., after stating the facts, continued: It is necessary to consider upon what principle the undoubted rule of the court that effect is to be given under certain circumstances to declarations in writing not properly attested is based. It is clear that no unattested document can be admitted to probate or treated as part of the will. It is established that a devisee or legatee who is entitled absolutely under the terms of the will is in no way affected by the existence of a document showing that he was not intended to enjoy beneficially if he had no knowledge of the document, till after the testator's death. Such a memorandum may or may not influence him as a man of honour, but no legal effect can be given to it. If, however, the devisee or legatee is informed of the testator's intention either before the will in her favour is made, or at any time afterwards before the testator's death, different considerations arise. It is sometimes said that under such circumstances a trust is created in favour of the beneficiaries under the memorandum. At other times it has been said that the devisee or legatee is bound by contract, express or implied, to give effect to the testator's wishes. Now the so-called trust does not affect the property except by reason of a personal obligation binding the individual devisee or legatee. If he renounces and disclaims, or dies in the lifetime of the testator, the persons claiming under the memorandum can take nothing against the heir-at-law or next-of-kin or residuary devisee or legatee. The case of Tee v. Ferris, 4 W. R. 352, 2 K. & J. 357, is instructive on this point. There a testator by his will gave his residue to Ferris and three other persons as tenants in common. By a memorandum of even date, not attested as a codicil, he expressed his confidence that the four persons would appropriate the residue to charitable objects. Ferris alone was informed of this in the testator's lifetime, and Wood, V.C., held that Ferris's quarter was affected by the memorandum, but that the other three quarters were not. At p. 363 he says: "It is well settled law that if the testator had read over to Ferris his will, and also the letter of the 18th of August, 1846, and said, 'Mr. Ferris, I have made that will and written that letter expressing my intentions in making it,' and Ferris had said nothing in reply, he would in this court have been taken to have contracted to carry those intentions into effect." He then held that, although Ferris did not know of the memorandum for sixteen months, and shortly before the testator's death, he could be in no better position. "That being so, it is impossible to contend that a beneficiary, placed in such a position, is at liberty to stand by and say nothing; and having so stood by and said nothing, is then to be at liberty, after the testator's death, to turn round and claim the benefit given him on the face of the will as if it had been given to him absolutely." In other words, a person to whom the testator's wishes are thus indicated is held to, in effect, contract that in consideration of the testator giving him the property absolutely, or if already given to him absolutely, not revoking it, he, the legatee, will give effect to the testator's wishes to the same extent and in the same manner as if those wishes had been formally expressed in a testamentary document admitted to probate. In Tee v. Ferris the declaration in the decree was that the quarter share given to Ferris was "effected by the trust thereof declared by the letter so far as such trusts are valid." And the decree went on to declare that so far as the real estate and impure personal estate were concerned, the trusts were invalid, and that the heir-at-law and next-of-kin were respectively entitled. The obligation imposed upon Ferris was, to treat his quarter exactly as if it had been in terms given by will or codicil for the charitable purposes mentioned in the letter, the result being that the heir-at-law and next-of-kin, who certainly were not intended to benefit, did in fact benefit. There is thus created what Lord Cairns in Jones v. Badley (adopting the language of Wood, V.C.) calls "in effect a case of trust"; and the court will not allow the devisee or legatee to set up the Wills Act. Another way of arriving at the same conclusion is to say that the devisee or legatee is estopped by his conduct from denying that the memorandum is part of the will. But whether the true principle be trust, contract, or estoppel, it seems to me that as between the devisee or legatee and the persons entitled under the memorandum, all the same consequences must follow as would follow if that interest formed part of the will.

Applying these principles to the present case, Miss Washington, who attested the memorandum, must be taken to be subject to a personal obligation to give effect to the memorandum precisely as if it had been duly executed as a codicil and admitted to probate.

It was faintly argued that the memorandum, if admitted to probate, would not have amounted to a specific bequest, but upon the language of the memorandum I can feel no doubt on this point. The result is that Miss Washington in dealing with the residuary real and personal estate given to her by the will must treat the property comprised in the memorandum as though it had been specifically bequeathed, and it follows from this that the residuary personal estate not comprised in the memorandum must first be exhausted to pay debts, &c., and that any deficiency must be borne rateably by the property comprised in the memorandum and by the real estate devised to Miss Washington. Kekewich, J., seems to consider the memorandum only operated as a gift of a portion of the residuary estate after the entire residue had been properly administered. But for the reasons I have stated I think this view is not correct. As against creditors, of course, the property is available. If there were any specific legatees or devisees other than Miss Washington this property must be exhausted before the properties bequeathed or devised to them could be touched. But as against Miss Washington this must be regarded as property specifically bequeathed.

The result is that the appeal must be allowed.

Chan. Div. Kekewich, J. — June 11, 18.

Jarrah Timber and Wood Paving Corporation (Limited) v. Samuel. (a.)

Mortgage — Redemption action — Security for loan — Stipulation that mortgagee may purchase mortgaged security at fixed price within definite time — Clog on equity of redemption.

A stipulation in a mortgage that the mortgagee shall have the option to purchase the whole or any part of the mortgaged security at a fixed price within a definite time is invalid as a clog on the equity of redemption.

Witness action.

The question raised in this action was whether a certain stipulation in a mortgage of debenture stock (i.e., that the mortgagee should have the option to purchase the stock at a given price within twelve months of the date of the mortgage) was void as against the mortgagors, as being a clog on the equity of redemption.

In the year 1901 the plaintiff company entered into negotiations with the defendant for a loan of £5,000.

On the 11th of June, 1901, the defendant wrote a letter to the plaintiffs which, so far as material to be here set out, was as follows:

"With reference to various conversations I have recently had with Mr. Bateman, one of your directors, who is, I understand, authorized to negotiate a loan to your company upon the security of £30,000 of its first mortgage debenture stock, I request that you will be good enough to inform your board that I am willing to advance the company at 6 per cent. per annum the sum of £5,000 sterling forthwith against transfer to me of such stock as collateral security, subject to your directors electing my nominee upon the board, to my having the option to purchase the whole or any part of such stock at 40 per cent. at any time within twelve months, and, in the event of the company at any time hereafter electing to raise any further capital or to sell its undertaking by way of amalgamation, or in any other manner for shares or stocks in another company, to my having the refusal of underwriting, by way of guaranteeing the taking up of such new capital, shares, or stock at a commission of 10 per cent. thereon; the advances to become due and payable on thirty days' notice on either side."

(a.) Reported by C. B. Camm, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

On the 14th of June, 1901, the secretary to the plaintiff company wrote to the defendant accepting his offer, and the certificate for £30,000 First Mortgage Debenture Stock was handed to the defendant in exchange for the £5,000.

On the 27th of February last the plaintiffs were desirous and offered to pay off the mortgage immediately, together with interest for thirty days in lieu of notice, but the defendant insisted that due notice should be given, and thereupon the defendant gave notice to the plaintiffs of his intention to exercise his option to purchase the stock. The plaintiffs thereupon commenced this action, asking for a declaration that the option was void, and that they were entitled to redeem upon payment of £5,000 at 6 per cent. per annum and thirty days' interest at the like rate in lieu of notice and costs, or alternatively were entitled to redeem the said debenture stock upon giving thirty days' notice.

The defendant, by way of counterclaim, asked for specific performance of the option to purchase.

Warrington, K.C., and Martelli, for the plaintiffs.—The stipulation as to mortgagee having an option to purchase is a clog on the equity of redemption and is void. If it were valid, the mortgagor could not, upon redemption, receive back the property as it was at the date of the mortgage; and that would be a clog on the equity of redemption: Noakes & Co. v. Rice, ante, p. 305, [1902] A. C. 24. The mortgagor is at liberty to pay off at any time on giving thirty days' notice, and if he prefers to pay off immediately, he is at liberty to do so upon paying interest for thirty days in lieu of such notice. The mortgagor is still entitled to redeem, whether mortgagee has given notice of his intention to exercise the option or not. The exercise of the option by the mortgagee, unless complete before redemption, is incompatible with the mortgagor's right to redeem, and is therefore invalid: In re Edwards' Estate, 11 Ir. Ch. Rep. 367. Lisle v. Reeve, ante, p. 231, [1902] 1 Ch. 53, is distinguishable, as this is an equitable mortgage. Even if I am not entitled to redeem at once, I am entitled to a declaration that I am entitled to redeem upon giving thirty days' notice.

P. O. Lawrence, K.C., and J. W. Manning, for the defendant.—This option does not come within the class of cases dealing with a clog on the equity of redemption, for all these cases are founded on the default of the mortgagor, and that is not the case here. This is a collateral bargain to the mortgage, such as is recognized in Noakes & Co. v. Rice to be good, and is a commercial transaction, which the plaintiffs do not allege to be an "unconscionable bargain." It amounts to a conditional sale, and is not really a mortgage at all: Carritt v. Bradley, 49 W. R. 593, [1901] 2 K. B. 550. Under contract no right of redemption in presenti exists until notice is given, and no notice can be given after the option to purchase is exercised.

Warrington, K.C., in reply.—This is not a conditional sale. [KEKEWICH, J.—You need not reply on that point.] I rely on Noakes & Co. v. Rice. Carritt v. Bradley is distinguishable, as in that case the mortgaged property was not affected. The stipulation here is void ab initio, as being a collateral bargain such as the mortgagee cannot bargain for: Noakes & Co. v. Rice. I submit that the mortgagee cannot give any notice which would affect mortgagor's right to redeem.

Cur. adv. vult.

KEKEWICH, J.—The question on which judgment was reserved is whether a particular stipulation in the contract between the parties which is contained in the letter of the 11th of June, 1901, is a clog on the plaintiffs' equity of redemption under that contract, and is therefore void. I dealt with the facts and with some subsidiary points at the trial, but it may be convenient here to repeat my conclusions. It was contended on behalf of the plaintiffs that they had tendered the money due on the 27th of February, 1902—that is, before the letter of the same date by which the defendant gave them notice of exercise of his option of purchase. My opinion on the evidence is that no tender was in fact made, but the point is immaterial, because, by the terms of the contract, thirty days' notice of payment was required and was not given, and it is admittedly clear that, without that, the plaintiffs could not insist on immediate redemption. The suggestion that the defendant was bound to accept interest in lieu of notice has and was really admitted at the bar to have no foundation. But it is said that what took place at the interview of the 27th was equivalent to notice, or at least was an intimation by the plaintiffs to the defendant that they wished to pay him off, and that after that intimation was received the defendant could not exercise his option of purchase. I do not think that what passed can be treated as equivalent to the notice required by the contract, but if it were such notice would not in my judgment defeat the defendant's right according to the terms of the contract. It seems to me that the option of purchase was reserved to him at least so long as the mortgage continued, and that an intention to redeem, even though formally notified, could not defeat it. There is no occasion to say more on these points, and I can now proceed directly to the main question.

The transaction was shortly this. The defendant advanced £5,000 to the plaintiffs, and they agreed to secure the repayment, with interest, by the transfer of £30,000 debenture stock. The defendant stipulated, first, that a nominee of his should join the plaintiffs' board; secondly, that he should have the option of purchasing the whole or any part of the debenture stock at 40 per cent. at any time within twelve months; and thirdly, that in the event of the plaintiffs' undertaking being disposed of, he should be entitled to underwrite new capital at a fixed commission. We are not concerned with the first or third of these stipulations, the question arising entirely on the second. Was that a clog on the equity of redemption?

It may be that the contract means that the option of purchase shall not be exercisable after repayment of principal and interest. If the contract means this, the case would be brought within the doctrine laid down by Buckley, J., in Lisle v. Reeve, but in the first place I do not myself think that this is the true meaning of the contract; and secondly, having regard to what was said in the Court of Appeal in the same case of Lisle v. Reeve, Buckley, J.'s, decision cannot be regarded as sound. For that I rely on the judgments in the Court of Appeal, and comments of my own would be impertinent. As regards the meaning of the contract, I need only say that there is not a word in it indicating that the option to purchase was not intended to be exercisable at any time within twelve months whatever happened in the interval, and I cannot see that the nature of the contract itself in anywise precludes the literal construction. When the defendant, on the 27th of February, was asked to retransfer the stock on payment of principal, interest, and costs he insisted on this view of the contract, and I think he was right. The question is whether the law allows it.

Taking the contract to mean what I say it does mean, the stipulation that the defendant shall, for twelve months, have an option to purchase the mortgaged stock at a certain price is, in my opinion, a clog or fetter on the plaintiffs' right to redeem. Some other cases have been referred to, but it is better to be content with the recent case of Noakes & Co. v. Rice, because it is a decision of the House of Lords, and the doctrine here sought to be applied is there stated in a manner which can leave no possible room for misunderstanding. It would be easy to quote the language of more than one learned lord who took part in the decision in order to show what test is to be applied here, but I will take one passage only from the judgment of Lord Davey, who, on p. 34 says: "The principle is this, that a mortgage must not be converted into something else, and when once you come to the conclusion that a stipulation for the benefit of the mortgagee is part of the mortgage transaction, it is but part of his security, and necessarily comes to an end on the payment off of the loan." It is really not arguable that the stipulation in question was not part of the mortgage transaction and part of the security. It is expressed on the face of the contract, in which the defendant expresses his willingness to advance the money, subject to, among other things, his having this option to purchase. And of course it was for the benefit of the mortgagee. Therefore, to use Lord Davey's phrase, it necessarily comes to an end on payment off of the loan. There was nothing to prevent the plaintiffs giving the thirty days' notice immediately after the advance—that is to say, they might by their act have determined the loan at the expiration of a month—and yet, according to the express bargain, the defendant might for eleven months from that time have had the right to prevent the plaintiffs from dealing with the debenture stock, because he had during that period the right to say that if he pleased he would purchase it at a fixed price. Thus regarded it is rather an extravagant instance of a clog or fetter of a right to redeem, inasmuch as it interferes with the ownership of the very property which is made the security of the loan. In this respect the transaction bears a close resemblance to that in Noakes & Co. v. Rice, where the mortgagee sought to impose a tie on a public-house after redemption.

The plaintiff will therefore have a declaration that the stipulation giving the defendant an option to purchase at any time within twelve months at 40 per cent. is void, and that they are entitled to redeem and have the stock transferred as they shall direct on payment of whatever is due for principal, interest, and costs, with consequent relief.

THE GOPHIR DIAMOND CO. (LIMITED) v. WOOD. (a.)

Contract—Restraint of trade—"Interested in" similar trade—Servant at a salary.

The manager of a jewellery business entered into a covenant with the proprietors of the business that he would not become interested in, either directly or indirectly, a similar trade or business to that carried on by the said proprietors. Subsequently he entered the employment of a firm in a similar business as an assistant at a fixed salary.

Held, that there was no breach of the covenant, as he had no "proprietary or pecuniary" interest in his new employment.

Motion.

This was a motion for an interim injunction brought by the Gophir Diamond Co. (Limited) to restrain Algernon Hayford Wood, the defendant, from remaining in the employment of Messrs. Goldstein & Co., who carried on a business similar to that of the plaintiffs.

The plaintiffs had shops at Nos. 145, 95, 176, 61, and 124, Regent-street, and Messrs. Goldstein's shop was at No. 99, Regent-street.

It appeared that in April, 1900, Wood, who was then acting or about to act as manager of the plaintiffs' establishment at 158, Regent-street, was a party to an agreement with the plaintiffs, which agreement contained the following clause: "The manager will not after the termination by notice or otherwise of his engagement, either alone or jointly with or as agent or otherwise for any person or persons, directly or indirectly solicit the custom of any of the customers of the company, or set up or become interested in, either directly or indirectly, a similar trade or business to that carried on by the company within a distance of twenty miles from Regent-street aforesaid, nor in any wise set up or become interested in, either directly or indirectly, any trade or business in opposition to, nor in any way interfere with, the trade or business of the company during the term of three years from the date of the determination of his engagement."

The defendant's engagement with the plaintiffs was terminated in April, 1901.

In March, 1902, defendant entered the employ of Messrs. Goldstein as assistant salesman.

The plaintiffs now asked for an interim injunction to restrain him from continuing in the employ of Messrs. Goldstein till the hearing of the action.

Buckmaster, for the plaintiff company.

Martelli, for defendant, argued that defendant was not "interested" in the sense that he had a proprietary or pecuniary interest in Messrs. Goldstein's business. He was simply a salesman at a salary.

Counsel quoted Smith v. Hancock, 42 W. R. 465, [1894] 2 Ch. 377, and Hill & Co. v. Hill, 35 W. R. 137.

Buckmaster replied.

SWINFEN EADY, J., said that the question to be determined was whether the defendant was "interested" in Messrs. Goldstein's business within the meaning of the clause in the agreement. Did the covenant entered into by the defendant with plaintiffs cover his present position? The covenant as set out differed materially from the common form. It did not provide that the defendant should not be "engaged or concerned or interested" in a similar business, but simply that he should not be "interested" therein. If it was the plaintiffs' intention to prevent the employment of the defendant in a similar business it would have been easy to say so.

In Smith v. Hancock the word "interested" was treated as referring to proprietary or pecuniary interest. In the present case the defendant was employed as a servant at a salary, and his remuneration did not depend on the profits or gross returns. There was therefore no breach of the covenant, and the motion would be refused.

MANNERS v. TYLER. (a.)

Adulteration—Sale of milk—Successive warranties—Jurisdiction of magistrates—Sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 63), ss. 25, 27—Sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1899, s. 20, sub-sections 5, 6.

The magistrates, in cases where the sale and delivery has taken place outside the jurisdiction of the court, have no jurisdiction to deal with a case of giving a false warranty, unless the warranty was given to the person from whom it was purchased for analysis.

Case stated by magistrates.

This was an appeal by the respondent against a conviction for selling milk with a false warranty contrary to the provisions of the Sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1875, s. 27, as amended by section 20 of the Sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1899.

The following facts appear from the special case as being proved before the magistrate:—

On the 14th of September, 1901, the appellant, who is a farmer, supplied to the Great Western and Metropolitan Dairies Co. (Limited), a churn of milk bearing the label "Warranted pure milk with all its cream." The milk was delivered to the company at Paddington, and they then removed the label.

On the 15th of September the milk was sent by a carman of the Dairies Co. to one Martha Dew, who carries on business as a milk seller at 5, Bechlow-road, Uxbridge. On the same day a pint of milk was purchased from Martha Dew by the respondent (who is an inspector under the Food and Drugs Acts), and on being analyzed was found to be adulterated with 8 per cent. of water.

On the 17th day of October Martha Dew was summoned before the magistrates under the Food and Drugs Acts for selling new milk not of the nature, substance, and quality demanded by the purchaser, but the summons was dismissed by the magistrates on her proving (in accordance with section 20 of the Act of 1875 as amended by section 26, sub-section 4 of the Act of 1899) that she had purchased the milk under a written contract, and that she had sold it in the same state as when received.

Notice of these proceedings was given to the Dairies Co., but no notice was given to the appellant. Proceedings were then taken on the 17th of October against the Dairies Co. for giving a false warranty contrary to section 27 of the Act of 1895 as amended by section 20, sub-section 6 of the Act of 1899.

This summons was dismissed on the ground that the company were entitled to the protection of section 25 of the Act of 1875, as amended by section 20, sub-section 6, of the Act of 1899, they having given the notices required by that section.

The present summons was then issued against the appellant.

It was contended on behalf of the appellant, inter alia, that he had not committed any offence within the jurisdiction of the court at Acton.

On behalf of the respondent reliance was placed on the provisions of section 20, sub-section 5, of the Act of 1899, which provides that "when the defendant in a prosecution under the Sale of Foods and Drugs Acts has been discharged under the provisions of section 25 of the Sale of Foods and Drugs Act, 1875, as amended by this Act, any proceedings under the Sale of Foods and Drugs Act for giving the warranty relied upon by the defendant in such prosecution may be taken as well before the court having jurisdiction in the place where the article of food or drug to which the warranty relates was purchased for analysis as before a court having jurisdiction in the place where the warranty was given."

Morton Smith, for the appellant.—The justices were wrong in convicting the appellant. The sale and delivery took place outside the jurisdiction, and the defendant is not therefore liable: Reg. v. Smith, 44 W. R. 492, [1896] 1 Q. B. 596. Section 20, sub-section 5, of the Act of 1899 only applies to the immediate warranty given to the purchaser, and there is no similar provision in sub-section 6.

L. A. Richards (J. C. Earle with him), for the respondent.—The magistrates were right. This was a prosecution under section 25 of the Act of 1875, and as they were discharged under that section the case is within the Act of 1899, s. 20, sub-section 5.

Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J.—This is an important question on the construction of section 20, sub-section 5 of the Act of 1899, and it is of course desirable that in these milk cases the same magistrates should decide the question. In Reg. v. Smith it was held that in cases under section 27 the magistrate had no power to hear the case when the sale and delivery took place outside his jurisdiction. Then there came section 20, sub-section 6 of the Act, which provides that when a defendant in a prosecution under the Sale of Foods and Drugs Act has been discharged under the provisions of section 25 of the Sale of Foods and Drugs Act, 1875, any proceedings under the Sale of Foods and Drugs Act for giving the warranty relied upon by the defendant relied upon in such prosecution may be taken as well before a court having jurisdiction in the place where the article of food or drug to which the warranty relates was purchased as before a court having jurisdiction in the place where the warrant was given.

The objection raised by the appellant that this sub-section only applies to cases where there has been a prosecution for the immediate warranty.

Turning back to section 25 of the Act of 1875, as amended by section 20, sub-section 6, of the Act of 1899, it provides that if the defendant in any prosecution under this Act prove that he had purchased the article in question as the same in nature, substance, and quality as that demanded of him by the prosecutor, he shall be discharged from the prosecution.

I think, therefore, that under that section no second proceeding could be taken. The proceedings against the dairy company were in fact taken under section 27 of the Act of 1899, as amended by section 20, sub-section 5, of the Act of 1899, and there are no corresponding words in that sub-section which will give the magistrates jurisdiction. I think it is also important to notice that the defence differs, as the defence under sub-section 5 is that they had reason to believe the statements were true. Although the magistrates thought they were acting under section 25 of the Act of 1875 they were really acting under section 20, sub-section 5, of the Act of 1899, and they had, therefore, no jurisdiction to entertain this case.

DARLING, J.—I agree.

CHANNELL, J.—I also agree. This section of the Act of 1899 was passed to remedy the defect in R. v. Smith, which raised a difficulty in the case of proceedings in the respect of a false warranty originally relied upon by the defendant. They did not think of the cases of successive warranties.

Appeal allowed.

PEARKS, GUNSTON, & TEE (LIMITED) (Appellants) v. HOUGHTON (Respondent). (a.)

Adulteration—Butter—Process of blending milk with butter—Increased percentage of water—Sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 63), s. 6.

A purchaser, acting on behalf of an inspector under the Sale of Food and Drugs Act, asked for and purchased from the appellants, grocers, half a pound of one shilling butter, which on analysis was proved to contain 7·8 per cent. more water than the limit of 16 per cent natural to butter. This excess of water was caused by a process adopted by the appellants of blending milk with butter. On the wall behind the butter counter in the appellants' shop there was a notice in large letters that the butter sold by them was "choicest butter blended with pure English full cream milk by new and improved machinery, whereby it retains about 20 to 24 per cent. of moisture." This notice was visible to anyone going into the shop, though the purchaser in this case did not observe it, nor was his attention called to it.

Held, that, as an ordinary purchaser entering the shop would see, and must be taken to have seen, the notice, the sale took place upon the notice, and was a sale of blended butter and not ordinary butter, and that, therefore, the sale could not be considered a sale to the prejudice of the purchaser within the meaning of section 6 of the Sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1875, and that, therefore, no offence had been committed under that section.

This was a case stated by justices of the peace acting in and for the borough of Richmond in the county of Surrey.

At the petty sessions held at Richmond on the 8th of August, 1901, an information preferred by Robert Houghton (the respondent) against Pearks, Gunston, & Tee, Limited (the appellants) under section 6 of the Sale of Food and Drugs Act 1875, charging that the appellants on the 12th of July, 1901, did unlawfully sell to the prejudice of the purchaser half a pound of shilling butter, which was not of the nature, substance and quality demanded, the same having had water added thereto to the extent of 7·8 per cent. of water beyond the usual limit of 16 per cent. of water natural to butter, was heard and determined, and the appellants were duly convicted of the said offence and ordered to pay a penalty of £20 and costs.

From the facts stated in the case it appeared that the appellants were grocers and provision merchants, and carried on business, amongst other places, in the borough of Richmond.

The respondent was an inspector under the Sale of Food and Drugs Act for the said borough.

On the 12th of July, 1901, the respondent caused Alfred Houghton to ask for and purchase on his, the respondent's, behalf, at the appellants' shop a half-pound of one-shilling butter for the purpose of analysis.

The public analyst certified that the butter contained 23·8 per cent. of water, which was 7·8 per cent. more water than the extreme limit of 16 per cent. natural to butter.

The butter so purchased was handed by the appellants' assistant to Alfred E. Houghton, and by him to the respondent, wrapped in two pieces of paper. On the inside wrapper or paper there was printed in large type the words "Pearks' Butter," and underneath this in much smaller type, "This is choicest butter, blended with pure English full cream milk, by new and improved machinery, whereby it retains about twenty to twenty-four per cent. of moisture, and acquires that delicacy of flavour which has made Pearks' Butter so famous."

When the respondent took off the outside paper wrapper in the appellants' shop in order to divide the butter into three parts for the purpose of analysis, he saw that there was something printed on the inside wrapper, but he did not read it and his attention was not called to it.

It was proved by the appellants that it is a common practice in the trade to blend different kinds of butter, and that the process adopted by the appellants was to put the butter into a churn with full cream milk and this was rechurned. Any excess of water in the butter in question was derived solely from the milk so added during this process of blending. No water was separately added to the butter.

It was stated in evidence on behalf of the appellants that the object of blending the butter with milk in this way was to give it uniform colour and flavour and to give it freshness, but there was no evidence that the milk was so added to the butter because it was required for the preparation of the butter as an article of commerce fit for carriage and consumption.

The price of full cream milk is three farthings a pound.

In a frame on the wall behind the butter counter in the shop there was a printed notice in large letters to the same effect as the notice on the inside wrapper. The butter counter faced the front of the shop, and this notice was visible to anyone going into the shop, but the respondent did not observe it and his attention was not called to it.

It was contended on behalf of the appellants that thd inside paper wrapper was a label within the meaning of section 8 of the Sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1875, that the printed notice in the shop was sufficient notice to the respondent, apart from the label, and that there was no evidence of fraud. Further, that as such wrapper and printed notice accurately stated the nature and composition of the article sold, there was no evidence of a sale to the prejudice of the purchaser within the meaning of section 6 of the said Act.

It was contended by the respondent that the sale was complete before he entered the shop, and that notice by label or otherwise was then too late.

That as the butter was delivered in a piece of plain opaque paper, which prevented the printing on the inside wrapper being visible until removed, and as in fact the respondent did not read it and did not purposely refrain from reading it, and his attention was not called to it, the inside wrapper did not constitute notice by label supplied at the time of delivering the article to the person receiving the same within the meaning of section 8 of the said Act; and that as he did not observe the notice on the wall, and his attention was not called to it, it was no notice to him at all.

The justices were of opinion (1) That the printed matter on the inside of the wrapper was in its terms inaccurate and misleading, and, on that ground, was not a sufficient notice by label within the meaning of section 8, inasmuch as it stated the result of the blending to be to "retain" in the butter about 20 to 24 per cent. of moisture, whereby it acquired delicacy of flavour, whereas the true and only result was to add 7·8 per cent. of water to the extreme limit of 16 per cent. natural to the butter.

(2) That for the like reasons the notice on the wall of the shop was not a sufficient notice.

(3) That as the butter was delivered in a plain piece of opaque paper, which until removal effectually concealed the inside wrapper and the printing thereon, and as the respondent did not in fact read the printing and did not purposely abstain from so doing, and having regard to the nature of the article asked for and to the fact that his attention was not called to the printing, the inside wrapper did not constitute a notice by label supplied at the time of delivering the article to the person receiving the same within the meaning of section 8.

(4) That as the respondent did not observe the printed notice on the wall in the shop, and having regard to the nature of the article asked for and the fact that his attention was not called to the said notice the same was no notice to him at all.

(5) That the sale of the article was complete before the respondent entered the shop and that notice by label or otherwise was too late.

(6) That the excess of 7·8 per cent. of water found in the butter was added fraudulently to increase the bulk and weight, and that on that ground also notice by label or otherwise was no protection to the appellants.

They therefore convicted the appellants.

The questions for the opinion of the court were:

(1) Whether the inside wrapper in which the butter was delivered was a sufficient notice by label within the meaning of section 8 of the Sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1875.

(2) Whether upon the facts stated there was sufficient notice otherwise than by label to the purchaser of what he was purchasing.

(3) Whether upon the facts stated there was any evidence that the excess of water in the butter was added fraudulently to increase the bulk or weight.

Asquith, K.C. (Avory, K.C., and H. D. Bonsey with him), for the appellants.—The only offence created by section 6 is selling to the prejudice of the purchaser, and unless that can be shewn no offence is committed within the section: Sandys v. Small, 26 W. R. 814, 3 Q. B. D. 449. It cannot be said that the sale is to the prejudice of the purchaser when he knows that the article is mixed. In the present case the purchaser must be taken, owing to the notice on the wall, to have had such knowledge. Further, the inside label is sufficient notice, and complies with the provisions of section 8: Jones v. Jones, 58 J. P. 653; Platt v. Tyler, 58 J. P. 71. There is also no evidence of fraud, and there has been full disclosure as to the nature of the article sold: Spiers & Pond v. Bennett, 44 W. R. 510, [1896] 2 Q. B. 65; Pope v. Tearle, 22 W. R. 950, L. R. 9 C. P. 499.

Alex. Glen, for the respondent.—There is ample evidence to support the finding of fraud. The purchaser asked for one-shilling butter, not Pearks's butter which is admitted not to be pure butter. The article was handed to him in a double wrapper, and there was no evidence he saw either the label on the inner wrapper or the notice on the wall. The milk blended with the butter was used fraudulently to increase the weight: Liddiard v. Reece, 44 J. P. 233; Horder v. Meddings, 44 J. P. 234; Pearks v. Knight, ante, p. 104, [1901] 2 K. B. 825. It was for the defendant to prove that there was no intent to defraud (see section 24), that he did not do and, therefore, the magistrates were compelled to find there was fraud. The word "retains" in the notice suggests that by the process of blending the butter retains moisture which otherwise would have evaporated, whereas, in fact, this excess of moisture is added in the process. That taken together with the relative price of the added material is sufficient to enable the magistrates to conclude that there was a fraudulent intent.

Asquith, K.C., replied.

Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J.—This case is not stated in a satisfactory way, and in the judgment I am about to deliver I wish only to speak for myself. If the court were satisfied that this compound had been sold as butter and nothing else said about it, there would be evidence of an offence under section 6. I think that was practically decided in the case of Pearks & Co. v. Knight, and I should have come to the same conclusion, but certainly that is not the way in which we ought to regard this case. Here the purchaser asked for half a pound of shilling butter. Now if it should turn out that there were various classes of butter in the appellants' establishment and that this was merely butter at a different price from the other butters notice ought to be given, but I understand the facts in this case to be that the appellants are selling one sort of butter only—viz., "blended butter." That is the conclusion I draw from the facts, and I do not intend anything I now say to apply to a case where different kinds of butters are sold. There are three questions left for us to decide. (1) Whether the inside wrapper delivered was a sufficient notice within section 8? (2) Whether upon the facts stated there was sufficient notice otherwise than by label to the purchaser of what he was purchasing? And (3) whether upon the facts stated there was any evidence that the excess of water in the butter was added fraudulently to increase the bulk or weight? Speaking for myself, I am not satisfied that if an offence had been made out under section 6 that the label would have protected the appellants. Section 8 provides that a person shall not be guilty of such an offence in respect of the sale of an article not intended fraudulently to increase the bulk if at the time of delivery he shall supply the purchaser receiving the same with notice or label. If we were dealing with that section only we should undoubtedly have to consider to a greater extent the words "intended fraudulently to increase its bulk," and we should have to say whether or not at the time of delivering such article the person was supplied with notice. I, myself, have very grave doubt whether delivering an article such as in this case with notice on an inner wrapper would be supplying the purchaser with a notice or label at the time of delivery of the article. I do not think Jones v. Jones is sufficient authority on the facts of this case.

The second question is a most important one—i.e., whether there was sufficient notice otherwise than by label. It is found as a fact that the big notice was hung in the shop behind the butter counter and visible to everyone going into the shop. That is a finding that an ordinary purchaser going in to buy this butter would see this notice, and that finding is not at all qualified by the statement that the respondent did not see it and that his attention was not called to it. I think it is quite impossible in face of that notice to assume that it only applied to one kind of butter sold in the shop.

I have come to the conclusion that it cannot be taken from the facts as stated that there was a sale of one of several classes of butter at varying prices, but that there was a sale of Pearks's butter only, namely, the same article as described in the notice. That being so I think we are bound by the case of Sandys v. Small and the case of Spiers & Pond v. Bennett, which I understand lay down the proposition that if a purchaser is told at the time of purchase and it is brought to his knowledge that the article sold is a blended article it cannot then be said that the thing is being sold to the prejudice of the purchaser. Here I think no question arises under section 24 and the prosecutor has to prove that there is a sale to the prejudice of the purchaser. It is good law and good sense that when a man is told he is buying butter blended with something else he is not entitled to come to us and say that he thought he was buying butter not mixed with anything. As to the terms of the notice they are not particularly happy. I think that to the person who understands the chemistry of butter and knows that it ordinarily contains only sixteen per cent. of moisture it would be wrong to say that it retains about twenty to twenty-three per cent. of moisture, but to the ordinary purchaser—who within the ruling of Sandys v. Small has to be considered—the notice is a statement that the butter is mixed with milk and that it has in it 23 per cent. of moisture. I do not think any misleading statement in that notice can do away with the broad statement that the butter sold at that shop is in accordance with the notice. I think, therefore, that the answer to the second question is in favour of the appellants and that there is no evidence of an offence under section 6. There remains the third question, which has become immaterial. When once you arrive at the fact that there is no offence under section 6 the question of supposed fraudulent addition does not arise at all, and it is only because the magistrates have overlooked the true view of the law, having regard to Sandys v. Small, that they have left this question to us. I think this case comes within the definition of Cockburn, L.C.J., and Lord Russell of Killowen, L.C.J., and that there was no sale to the prejudice of the purchaser, and that this appeal should be allowed.

DARLING, J.—I am of the same opinion. In what the appellants have done here they have sailed exceedingly near the winds. In my view they are only saved by the large notice which they had put up in the shop. If it had not been for that, and they had relied simply upon the labels, my opinion is that they would not have brought themselves within the protection of the statute. I do not desire to say a word against Jones v. Jones because I do not think that what was done here comes within the rule in that case. There the paper covering was the usual way of delivering the article to the purchaser. I do not think that anyone could say that the usual way of selling butter is to put it in a piece of paper on which it is stated that the butter is mixed with something else and then to wrap round it a piece of opaque paper which prevents the purchaser from reading what is on the inner wrapper. I should not think of saying that there was no label. There was a label but it was wanting in all the elements present in Jones v. Jones. The label was not, I gather, put round the butter at the time of delivering it to the purchaser; I understand the butter was kept wrapped up in the paper with the printed notice on and then had the thick outer wrapper put round it. With regard to the large notice put up in the shop I think the wording is very suspicious, but to say that it makes one suspect the article which it praises is one thing, to say that it convinces one it is prepared fraudulently to increase its bulk is another, and, except this, I cannot see any evidence that the preparation was made fraudulently to increase the bulk and measure. The wording is suspicious, because it says: "Made by improved machinery whereby it retains moisture and acquires delicacy." That does not express the thing accurately. To my mind the words "whereby it acquires moisture and delicacy" would better meet the facts of the case.

CHANNELL, J.—This article is a perfectly legitimate article, but it is not butter, and therefore the court in the case of Pearks & Co. v. Knight, where it was sold as butter, decided that there was an offence against section 6, inasmuch as there was the selling a thing not of the nature, substance, and quality demanded. But this article is one which it is legitimate to sell as blended butter. Whether there is sufficient evidence of a sale to the prejudice of the purchaser seems to depend upon whether it was in fact sold as blended butter or as butter, and it is obvious that after the decision in Pearks & Co. v. Knight the appellants here took steps intended to meet that decision and to protect themselves by selling this article solely as blended butter. Both these notices may be criticized, but they both begin by saying that the article is choicest butter blended and then go on to say that it contains more than the ordinary amount of moisture. Consequently if the sale took place upon these notices it is a sale of blended butter and not of ordinary butter. The difficulty in dealing with these cases as to prejudice always arises from the fact that the purchaser before the court is nearly always an inspector who is buying for the purpose of analysis and not for his own consumption, and so you have to look at the circumstances and see whether, if he had been an ordinary purchaser, he would have been prejudiced. There always arises the difficulty when there is a notice in the shop as to whether an ordinary purchaser would have seen it. An inspector is not likely to go searching about for a notice; we have to consider what an ordinary purchaser would do. In this case there was a large notice in a conspicuous place so that anyone would see it. That brings this case within the decision of Spiers & Pond v. Bennett, which says that under such circumstances as that the sale could not be considered to be to the prejudice of the purchaser. That sufficiently disposes of this case. The process was carried out in order to increase the weight, bulk, and measure of the article, but it does not necessarily follow that that was done fraudulently. If it was done with the honest intention of selling the article as what it was—namely, blended butter, there was no fraud in doing something which would increase its weight and bulk.

E. v. E. (OTHERWISE T.). (a.)

Nullity of marriage—Frigidity—Refusal to allow intercourse—Six months' cohabitation—Variation of settlements.

Where the respondent resisted all attempts at intercourse for a period of six months.

The Court annulled the marriage and varied the marriage settlement, ordering the respondent to pay an annual sum to the petitioner.

This petition alleged that by reason of the frigidity, impotence, or malformation of the respondent, or by some other physical defect which existed at the time of the first ceremony of marriage (there were two, one civil and one religious) the petitioner had been and still was wholly unable to consummate the marriage, and that such frigidity, impotence, or malformation was incurable by skill.

The respondent in her answer did not admit the allegations of the petition.

(a.) Reported by GWYNNE HALL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Inderwick, K.C., and Low, for the petitioner.—In examination in chief the petitioner deposed that he had made the acquaintance of the respondent in January, 1898, she being then about 22 years old, and in June, 1898, he became engaged to her, and on the 7th of November, 1898, they were married. There was no cohabitation of the parties until the 29th of March, when there was a religious ceremony, and the respondent's father gave her away. The parties travelled straight through to Rome after the marriage ceremony, and on the first night after their arrival there the petitioner attempted to consummate the marriage. The respondent objected very strongly and made the excuse that she was very tired, and the petitioner desisted from further attempt. The following night a second attempt was made, but the respondent screamed and resisted all attempts for nearly an hour by putting herself into an impossible position, alleging that it made her sick. Further attempts were made about three times a week, but in Naples, where the parties travelled to after they had spent a week in Rome, the respondent insisted on having a separate bedroom, and despite persuasion and reasoning, the respondent refused the petitioner, calling him a beast and a brute, and told him that no honourable man would put his wife to such indignities and insults. As she asked the petitioner to put it off, no further attempts were made until the return of the parties to this country, about the 3rd or 4th of May. Another attempt was then made, but was again frustrated by the respondent. Within a fortnight of the marriage she had threatened the petitioner that if he persisted she would leave him. Her resistance prevented full but not partial intercourse. A female relative of the respondent, at the request of the petitioner, spoke to her about the matter, and the respondent, in reference to that conversation, told the petitioner that the lady in question was "a thousand years behind the times," and that she (the respondent) had "no intention of having children." The petitioner talked and reasoned with the respondent and continued to attempt intercourse, but the resistance got worse. And on the 10th of October the respondent went to her parents on the understanding that it was a short visit. On the 13th of October the petitioner wrote to her saying: "I have told you over and over again in my opinion the root of the whole difficulty is that no married couple, at least no young married couple can live in happiness without what is the one essential thing to a perfect union. I have continually and persistently tried by every means in my power (short of force) to induce you to allow me what it is your duty and what the instincts of nature should make it your pleasure to give. I have appealed to you with loving and passionate words, also with quiet reasoning and entreaty, but in spite of all our marriage has never been consummated owing to your persistent objections and strenuous opposition, and after our six months of married life—unhappy months they have been to me—I can only assume the reason you refuse to countenance anything of the kind is that you unfortunately are subject to or are suffering from some physical incapacity. Now that you are at home once more I urge and implore you once more to consult your own friends and your own doctor so that this cloud may be cleared away. For if we are to live happily together you must get over those objections to consummation, and you must really try to fulfil those other duties which a wife owes to her husband. . . ." On the 24th of October the respondent replied: "I did not see that your letter needed an immediate answer, and as I went home to avoid family troubles I did not wish to be pursued by them there. I am extremely annoyed that you are behaving in this silly, babyish way. I suppose you think it is amusing; I don't. I am in no hurry to return, and shall do so at my leisure, and hope to find you in a better temper. . . . Yours truly, ——." Finding that nothing could be done, the husband presented this petition, and on the 1st of November, 1899, the usual order for inspection was made, and the respondent declined to submit. Dr. Garlick, one of the examiners appointed, was called, and put in the certificate as to the petitioner's ability.

Priestley, for the respondent.—I ask nothing.

JEUNE, P.—I do not think anybody else need be called. I think it is sufficient. I see no reason to disbelieve the husband, and he is confirmed by the examination. Therefore there will be a decree nisi, with costs.

On the 29th of October, 1900, the decree nisi was made absolute.

March 2, 1902.—Motion to vary the report of the registrar on variation of settlements.

A settlement had been executed on the 24th of October, 1898, by which the respondent assigned to trustees the sum of £50,000, to be raised out of the share, estate, or "interest" of the respondent, whether vested or contingent under or by virtue of the will of her grandfather as soon as might be thereafter the same share and promises should fall into possession and be paid to the trustees. And, further, all the annual or other income which, pending the falling into possession of the share and premises, should, from the solemnization of the said intended marriage, be payable to the respondent.

Inderwick, K.C., and Low, K.C., for the petitioner.—The registrar was wrong in reporting that having regard to the petitioner's position there should be no application of the settled property for his benefit. The settled funds ought to have been charged with a sum of money in favour of the petitioner to compensate him for the loss caused to him by the conduct of the respondent. Alternatively the registrar ought to have reported in favour of some annual sum being paid to the petitioner out of the income of the settled funds during his life as compensation. It was a moot point whether in cases of nullity the settlement became absolutely ipso facto void or not. The idea formerly was that the settlement remained until it was set aside by the order of the court either wholly or in part.

JEUNE, P.—Dormer v. Ward, 49 W. R. 149, [1901] P. 20, does not appear to decide the point.

Inderwick, K.C.—No. A. (otherwise M.) v. M., 10 P. D. 178, is always referred to in such circumstances, but the case does not bear out the head-note. The head-note runs, "A marriage having been annulled, the court ordered all the property of the alleged wife to be reconveyed to her freed from the trusts of the settlement upon the alleged marriage." Butt, J., in that case acted upon the authority of Chapman v. Bradley, 12 W. R. 140, 4 De G. J. & S. 71. Although a settlement may be regarded as not continuing after the decree, yet the property in the settlement may be dealt with by the court as if the decree had set aside the settlement.

Bargrave Deane, K.C., and Priestley.—The settlement came to an end when the decree was made absolute. The settlement provides that if the intended marriage should not be solemnized within six calendar months the settlement should be void and the trust premises be reconveyed and reassigned or released to the respondent. The decree absolute declared the marriage null and void, and therefore the marriage had never been validly solemnized. If the court has jurisdiction, even then the only property which can be dealt with by the court is the income of the respondents share of her grandfather's estate to the extent which she enjoyed the same prior to the date of the decree absolute and not the capital or further income of which during her father's and the executor's lives she is not in possession or enjoyment. This case is not covered by Dormer v. Ward.

JEUNE, P., held that the effect of the deed so far as it referred to the £50,000 was clearly to settle the property, and what actually passed into the hands of the trustees was the sum to be raised hereafter, and therefore there was that reversion in the hands of the trustees. It was a settlement of the expectancy. Taking into consideration the income of the respondent and the average income of the petitioner, the court ordered the respondent to pay £200 a year for life to the petitioner, the deed securing the same to be settled by conveyancing counsel.

In re A DEBTOR.
Ex parte THE JUDGMENT CREDITOR. (a.)

Bankruptcy notice — Judgment creditor — Seizure by sheriff under fi. fa.—Withdrawal without return to writ—Right to issue notice—Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52), s. 4 (1) (g).

A judgment creditor issued a writ of fi. fa. against the judgment debtor's goods, but, on learning that all the goods at the debtor's residence were claimed by third parties, directed the sheriff to withdraw, which the sheriff did without making any return to the writ. The judgment creditor then issued a bankruptcy notice for the amount of the debt against the judgment debtor.

Held, on the evidence, that the sheriff was never in possession of any goods of the judgment debtor, and that the judgment creditor accordingly had a right to issue the bankruptcy notice, since there was no stay, express or implied, nor had the sheriff realized anything by the seizure or sale of the goods of the debtor, for which he was bound to account or make a deduction from the judgment debt.

Order of the registrar discharged.

Miller v. Parnell, 6 Taunt. 370, discussed.

This was an appeal from an order of Mr. Registrar Brougham setting aside a bankruptcy notice with costs.

The facts were as follows:

In January, 1902, a creditor obtained a judgment against a debtor for a sum of over £400, and on the 11th of February he issued a writ of fi. fa. against the debtor's goods.

The sheriff seized certain goods at the house where the debtor resided with his wife; but three days afterwards a firm of solicitors acting for the wife gave notice by letter that the lease of the house was in her name and that she claimed most of the goods in it as her absolute property, while the remainder were vested in the trustees of her marriage settlement, one of whom was a member of the firm of solicitors. [The evidence of the debtor and of the sheriff's officer as to the goods seized is referred to in the judgment.]

On the receipt of this letter the creditor directed the sheriff to withdraw, which he did on the 18th of February; and the creditor immediately thereupon issued a bankruptcy notice against the debtor for the whole of the judgment debt.

The debtor applied to set it aside on the ground that it was issued in bad faith.

The registrar held that this had not been made out, but as it appeared that the sheriff had made no return to the writ he set aside the notice on that ground, on the authority of an unreported case of In re Cochrane, decided by the Court of Appeal on the 9th of March, 1900.

H. Reed, K.C., and Bartley Denniss, for the appellants.—Though the creditor directed the sheriff to withdraw, he could have obtained another writ in another county without a return to the first writ, and seizure under the second writ would not be unlawful. There is nothing in this case which prevents a bankruptcy notice from being issued. The respondent must show that execution had been stayed; and the authorities only show that there is a stay if the creditor is not in a position to enforce execution. Here there had not been a levy of a single penny; there had been a mere seizure. The writ here is still a lively one.

M. Mackenzie, for the respondent.—The case is brought within In re Follows and In re Cochrane by the letter from the wife's solicitors. A creditor issuing a bankruptcy notice must be in a position to enforce judgment by execution. There was an actual levy under the writ, and having seized and abandoned the goods the creditor could not re-enter for the whole amount.

Denniss, in reply.—The seizure was a seizure of a stranger's goods, and therefore no seizure at all. In Clerk v. Withers the judgment creditor had made his election to hold to the goods.

Cur. adv. vult.

June 20.—VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J., delivered the judgment of the court as follows: In this case the question is whether a bankruptcy notice ought to be set aside on the ground that at the time of the service of the notice a writ of fi. fa. had been delivered to the sheriff and seizure had been made thereunder, and no return had been made by the sheriff. Now Miller v. Parnell is a plain authority for the proposition that if a judgment creditor does cause the sheriff to execute his fi. [illegible] re he cannot have a writ of ca. sa. till the fi. fa. is completely executed and returned, and that this is so even though the execution creditor abandons the seizure of the goods. Miller v. Parnell was recognized as good law in Chapman v. Bowlby, and by Pollock, C.B., and Martin, B., in Andrews v. Saunderson, 5 W. R. 317, 1 H. & N. 725, in which latter case it was strenuously argued, but unsuccessfully, that the rule against the issue of a new fi. fa. had no application unless something had been realized under the first execution. But it is to be observed that in Peploe v. Galliers, 4 Moore 163, in the Court of Common Pleas, on a special demurrer to a plea to a declaration in scire facias, the court held the plea bad because it merely stated that the sheriff seized the debtor's goods and took them in execution, and did not proceed to state that the sheriff had returned the writ. The goods might have been restored to the defendant, and on this ground the plaintiff was entitled to judgment. This case certainly seems to assume that there may be a second writ if the goods seized under the first writ had been restored to the judgment debtor. But be this how it may, this case, decided on special demurrer, cannot be taken to overrule Miller v. Parnell, which was acted on in Andrews v. Saunderson and many other cases since Peploe v. Galliers, but of course might nevertheless fortify this court if we were disposed to review Miller v. Parnell. There is one more observation we would wish to make on Miller v. Parnell, and that is that its authority does not seem to us to be impaired by the decision of the Court of Appeal in Lee v. Dangar, Grant, & Co. In that case the two writs of fi. fa. in the City of London and London County were issued concurrently, and not in succession, and Miller v. Parnell had, therefore, no application. Although we have thought it right, having regard to the argument before us, to make these observations on the authority of Miller v. Parnell, we do not think that on the facts of the present case Miller v. Parnell has any application. It seems to us, on the evidence, that no goods of the debtor were seized. The debtor says so himself, and although he goes on in his evidence to say that there were in the house pictures and personal property of his own, and although the sheriff's officer's evidence is not inconsistent with his having seized everything in the house, yet we do not think that it is open to the debtor to contend that property of his was seized, because we think that the right conclusion in fact is that the debtor, knowing of the claim of the trustees of the marriage settlement and of his wife—which covered everything in the house, although he might not know in what proportions his wife and the trustees respectively might claim—deliberately allowed the execution creditor to withdraw the execution and seizure and restore these goods to the claimant. Now Miller v. Parnell, in our judgment, only applies in cases in which there has been a seizure of goods of the judgment debtor—that is to say, of goods which the writ directs and authorizes the sheriff to seize—and has no application if the seizure of the goods of a stranger. If the seizure is of goods which the sheriff is directed to seize under the fi. fa., the sheriff, if an action of trespass were brought for the seizure, would require the return to the writ to enable him to justify under the fi. fa. (Hodgkinson v. Whalley, 2 Cr. & J. 86); and in Andrews v. Saunderson, Pollock, C.B., pointed out that on the question whether a second writ of execution can issue without a return to the first, the test is not whether there was a substantial levy, but whether anything has been done which renders the existence of the writ necessary for the justification of the sheriff. It follows from this that the principle of Miller v. Parnell will not make the issue of a second writ of fi. fa. illegal or irregular in a case where the seizure has been the seizure of goods other than the goods of the judgment debtor; for neither the writ nor anything which the sheriff purports to do under it can justify the sheriff if he has seized the goods of a stranger. In our judgment the seizure by the sheriff of the goods of a stranger not only does not make the issue of a fresh writ, say, in another county, wrong, but also does not in any way interfere with the seizure by the sheriff, under the existing writ of fi. fa., of any goods within his bailiwick which are the goods of the defendant, and consequently fall within the direction in the writ of fi. fa. The seizure of the goods of a stranger may, of course, prevent the issue of a fresh writ or further proceedings under the existing writ in a case where the sheriff interpleads, because in such a case there is either an express stay by the interpleader order or an implicit stay by the pendency of the summons. The result is that in our judgment the judgment creditor in the present case had a right to serve the bankruptcy notice, for there was no stay, express or implied, and the sheriff had not realized anything by the seizure or sale of the goods of the debtor for which he was bound to account or make a deduction from the judgment debt mentioned in the bankruptcy notice; nor was the sheriff in possession of the goods of the judgment debtor, nor had he ever been so. We think this appeal must be allowed and the registrar's order discharged with costs both here and below.

CLATWORTHY v. R. & H. GREEN (LIMITED). (a.)

Master and servant—Employers' liability—Accident—Compensation—Payment into court—Stay of proceedings—Costs up to payment into court—Jurisdiction of arbitrator—Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897 (60 & 61 Vict. c. 37), Schedule II., par. 6—Workmen's Compensation Rules, 1898, r. 5 (3).

The employers of a workman who met with his death by accident in the course of his employment agreed with his widow as to the amount of compensation to which she was entitled under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, but refused to pay her the amount because she had not taken out letters of administration. She commenced proceedings under the Act, and thereupon the employers paid the amount into court.

Held, that, though by rule 5 (3) of the Workmen's Compensation Rules, 1898, the payment into court operated as a stay of proceedings, the county court judge had jurisdiction to make an order allowing the widow her costs up to the payment into court and also her costs of the application for costs.

Appeal from an order of the judge of the Bow County Court in an arbitration under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897.

A workman in the service of the employers sustained personal injury by accident in the course of his employment, which resulted in his death.

He left a widow and children wholly dependent on his earnings at the time of his death. The employers admitted that the widow was entitled to be paid

(a.) Reported by F. G. RÜCKER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

£300, the maximum amount of compensation awardable under the Act, for the benefit of herself and her children; and they said that they would pay that sum to the widow when she had taken out letters of administration. She did not take out letters of administration, and the employers refused to pay her the amount.

The widow then filed a request for arbitration under the Act, and thereupon the employers paid the sum of £300 into court.

An application was made by the widow to the county court judge for an order for her costs up to the payment into court and of the application.

By paragraph 6 of the Second Schedule to the Act "the costs of and incident to the arbitration and proceedings connected therewith shall be in the discretion of the arbitrator."

Rule 5 of the Workmen's Compensation Rules, 1898, provides as follows: "(1) In any case in which the amount payable as compensation to the dependants of a deceased workman has been agreed upon or ascertained, but any question arises as to who are dependants, or as to the amount payable to each dependant, an application for the settlement of such question by arbitration may be made either by the legal personal representative (if any) of the deceased workman on behalf of the dependants or any of them, or if there is no legal personal representative, by such dependants or any of them against the other dependants and the persons claiming to be dependants, but as to whose claim to rank as such a question arises. . . . (3) In any such case the employer, if made a respondent, may pay the amount of compensation in his hands into court, to be dealt with as the judge or arbitrator shall direct, and thereupon further proceedings against him shall be stayed."

It was contended on the part of the applicant that she had taken the proper steps to enforce her claim in accordance with the provisions of the Act, and that she was therefore entitled to her costs.

It was contended on the part of the employers that the effect of rule 5 (3) was that the county court judge had no jurisdiction to make any order as to costs in this case.

The county court judge was of opinion that the costs incurred by the applicant were properly incurred and he ordered them to be paid by the employers, and he further ordered the employers to pay the costs of the application.

The employers appealed.

Arthur Powell, K.C., and W. Addington Willis, for the employers.

Chester Jones, for the applicant.

COLLINS, M.R.—This is an appeal from the exercise of the discretion of the county court judge ordering the employers to pay the applicant her costs up to payment into court and also her costs of the application for costs. The case seems to me to be a very simple one, and when it is rightly understood I think there is no ground for the contention of the appellants. The applicant is a widow who claimed compensation on behalf of herself and her children in respect of the death of her husband, who was killed by an accident in the course of his employment. The employers agreed with the applicant as to the amount of compensation to which she was entitled, but refused to pay it unless she took out letters of administration. That she has not done. Had the employers the right to insist on this, to impose on her the obligation of taking out letters of administration as a condition precedent to her right to receive payment of the amount to which it was agreed that she was entitled? In my opinion they certainly had no such right. Under these circumstances she took proceedings to recover compensation under the Act, and then the employers paid the sum of £300 into court. That operated as a stay of further proceedings under rule 5, sub-rule 3, of the Workmen's Compensation Rules, 1898. But what of the costs up to that time? Paragraph 6 of Schedule II. to the Act provides that the costs of and incident to the arbitration and proceedings connected therewith shall be in the discretion of the arbitrator. The county court judge therefore clearly had jurisdiction over the costs of the arbitration, and he had before him the fact, which he was entitled to take into consideration, that everything was agreed between the parties except as to a condition which ought not to have been imposed. It is to be noticed that it was not till the applicant's attempt to obtain compensation by agreement had failed that she took proceedings under the Act, as indeed she was then obliged to do, and upon that the employers paid the money into court. It seems to me to be obvious that the county court judge had a discretion to deal with the costs up to the time of payment into court. But it is said that he had no right to order the employers to pay the applicant's costs of the application for costs. I cannot agree with that suggestion. In my opinion the provision in rule 5 (3) as to payment of money into court operating as a stay did not prohibit the county court judge from giving the applicant her costs up to the time of payment into court, and also the costs of her application.

Chan. Div. Byrne, J. — May 31.

JARRED v. CLEMENTS. (a.)

Vendor and purchaser—Equitable mortgage—Notice—Forged signature—Legal estate—Title deeds.

A purchaser who had notice of an equitable mortgage on a property, paid the purchase-money for the same upon a receipt for what was due on the equitable mortgage being handed to her solicitors. The purchaser acquired also the legal estate and the title deeds. The signature to the receipt was forged.

Held, in an action brought by the equitable mortgagee, that the equitable mortgage must be enforced against the purchaser.

Trial of action.

This was an action in which the plaintiff Nathaniel Jarred claimed as against the defendant an account of what was due to him on an equitable mortgage on two semi-detached villas, 3 and 4, Mornington-villas, Mornington-road, Woodford Wells, Essex, and in default of payment foreclosure or sale and for the delivery to him by the defendant of the title deeds and writings relating to the mortgaged premises.

The facts of the case are as follows:

On the 15th of January, 1897, a Mr. Joseph Taylor, in consideration of the sum of £450 advanced to him by the plaintiff, signed a memorandum of deposit, and deposited the title deeds and writings relating to the property with the plaintiff.

(a.) Reported by J. ARTHUR PRICE, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

In September, 1898, a receiving order in bankruptcy was made against Taylor, who, in his amended statement of affairs, verified on oath, stated that the plaintiff was a fully secured creditor of his for £450 and that the particulars of his security were "Mortgage of 3 and 4, Mornington-villas, Woodford," &c.

The said receiving order was rescinded in January, 1899.

On the 13th of July, 1899, the two houses were put up for auction by Taylor, but were bought in by him.

The defendant in the action, Mrs. Emma E. Clements, who was present at the auction, subsequently entered into negotiations with him for the purchase of the said houses, and on the 17th of July, 1899, entered into a contract to purchase them free from incumbrances for £630.

An abstract of title was furnished to the defendant's solicitors by Charles Parr, Taylor's solicitor, which did not disclose the equitable charge. The defendant's solicitors, however, inspected the record of Taylor's bankruptcy proceedings, and ascertained the existence of the said mortgage. Thereupon they wrote to Parr as follows: "We have to-day made the usual searches; but we thought it necessary to inspect the bankruptcy proceedings to see that the receiving order that had been made had been discharged. We see that in these proceedings it was stated that Nos. 3 and 4, Mornington-villas were subject to a mortgage for £450. Please let us have an abstract of this mortgage and of the discharge of it." To this letter they received from Parr, on the 5th of August, 1899, the following reply: "I am in receipt of yours of yesterday, and as I informed you on the telephone this morning, the mortgage you refer to is a mere memorandum of deposit of deeds, and I shall be pleased to hand you the same with receipt indorsed on completion. I trust you will be able to arrange for completion one day during next week, as I want to get away by the 14th." The defendant's solicitors were satisfied with this assurance, and completion took place in due course on the 10th of August, 1899, when an assignment of the property by Taylor to the defendant passing the legal estate was duly executed. At the same time the memorandum of deposit with what purported to be an added receipt dated the 10th of August, 1899, in due form for all moneys due on the security, signed by the plaintiff, was handed over to the defendant's solicitors, together with the title deeds and papers relating to the property.

The signature was not in fact that of the plaintiff, but was forged by Parr, who was also at that time the plaintiff's solicitor, and with whom the plaintiff had left the title deeds of the property for safe custody. Parr had, however, received no authority from him to deal with them in any way. The plaintiff knew nothing of the transaction, and on ascertaining the facts commenced his action. His lordship considered that no reasonable precaution was omitted by the defendant or her solicitors, nor was the plaintiff guilty of any negligence or misconduct.

Norton, K.C., and T. T. Methold, for the plaintiff.—The defendant is not in the position of a purchaser for value without notice. Her solicitors were aware of the existence of the equitable mortgage. Under these circumstances she is not protected by having the legal estate and the possession of the deeds.

Rowden, K.C., and W. H. Cozens-Hardy, for defendant.—This is a case between two innocent parties whose equities are equal. The defendant has the legal estate and has taken every reasonable precaution. She also holds the title deeds and had every reason to believe that the equitable mortgage had been discharged. The court should not, therefore, grant the plaintiff relief against her. Further the memorandum did not operate as a charge because it contained no description of the property charged: Ratcliffe v. Barnard, 19 W. R. 764, L. R. 6 Ch. 652; Bailey v. Barnes, 42 W. R. 66, [1894] 1 Ch. 25; Hewitt v. Losemore, 9 H. 449; Gainsborough v. Watcome Terra Cotta Clay Co., 54 L. J. Ch. 991.

Norton, K.C., replied.

BYRNE, J., after stating the facts: Under these circumstances the question arises whether the defendant, having the legal estate and possession of the title deeds, is entitled to hold the property free from the mortgage, or whether the plaintiff, as equitable mortgagee, can uphold the security.

I think that the contention of the plaintiff must prevail. There was a subsisting charge in his favour of which the defendant had notice prior to payment of the purchase-money. Having such notice, it was for her or her solicitors on her behalf to be satisfied that the incumbrance was discharged before parting with the money. They were satisfied with what appeared to be, but was not in fact, sufficient evidence; and I am unable to say that the fraud practised upon them by the vendor's solicitors enabled the defendant to stand in the same position as if she had never had notice of the charge. If the arrangement had been that the equitable mortgagee should join in the assignment to the defendant, and he had not joined, but some person had fraudulently personated him and forged his name at the completion, the point would have appeared, I think, clear; but the principle seems to me the same.

The case is a hard one upon the defendant, and not the less so because if less diligence had been shown by the gentleman who actually made the search in bankruptcy the mortgage would probably never have been disclosed, and the purchaser could then have claimed to be purchaser without notice; but, on the other hand, a decision against the plaintiff would have been equally hard upon him, as he would have been deprived of his security without any default on his part by the fraud for which I feel bound to hold the defendant must suffer instead.

The point was taken that the memorandum of deposit did not operate as a charge because the property included in it was not described, but inasmuch as the mortgagor and mortgagee as well as the purchaser all knew and acted upon the footing that the property intended to be dealt with by the memorandum was, as in fact it was, that to which the deposited deeds related, and as the deposit alone would have created an effectual charge, I do not think that this matter can effect the result. It is a most unfortunate case.

Judgment for the plaintiff.

BRITISH HOMES ASSURANCE CORPORATION (LIMITED) v. PATTERSON. (a.)

Partnership—Contract with partner before partnership—Fraud of co-partner—Novation of original contract—Election—Partnership Act, 1890 (53 & 54 Vict. c. 39), ss. 10, 11 (a).

(a.) Reported by PAUL STRICKLAND, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Where A. has entered into a contract with B., and B. and C. subsequently become partners, but A. elects to stand by the original contract with B., he cannot, by issuing a writ against B. and C., make an election to novate and render C. liable, it being, under the circumstances, unjust.

This was an action to make the defendant liable for the fraud of his partner. The facts are fully set forth in the judgment of Farwell, J.

The Partnership Act, 1890, provides:

Section 10.—Where, by any wrongful act or omission of any partner acting in the ordinary course of the business of the firm, or with the authority of his co-partners, loss or injury is caused to any person not being a partner in the firm, or any penalty is incurred, the firm is liable therefor to the same extent as the partner so acting or omitting to act.

Section 11.—In the following cases, namely—(a) Where one partner acting within the scope of his apparent authority receives the money or property of a third person and misapplies it; and (b) Where a firm in the course of its business receives money or property of a third person, and the money or property so received is misapplied by one or more of the partners while it is in the custody of the firm; the firm is liable to make good the loss.

Jenkins, K.C., and A. P. Poley, for the plaintiffs.

Upjohn, K.C., and F. Thompson, for the defendant.

FARWELL, J., in giving judgment, said: This is one of those unfortunate cases in which the court has to determine which of two innocent parties must suffer for the defalcations of a rogue.

The plaintiffs are a land company, whose chief business is to advance money on the mortgage of house property out of the funds of the company as and when available, to the holders of house property certificates.

The defendant is a solicitor. In the year 1899 the plaintiffs appointed one Frederick Atkinson, who carried on business as a solicitor at Hastings and Bexhill under the firm of Atkinson & Atkinson, to act as their solicitor in their mortgage transactions on certain special terms. The plaintiffs knew that Atkinson was in business alone, although trading under the style of Atkinson & Atkinson. In the early part of the year 1900 the plaintiffs instructed Atkinson as their solicitor to carry out a mortgage, to be made by one Coleman. The business was somewhat protracted, and the money to complete the mortgage was not sent by the plaintiffs until March, 1901. In the meantime—namely, on the 31st of December, 1900, the defendant entered into partnership with Atkinson; no books of any sort were produced to him, but accountants on his behalf examined the affairs of Atkinson, and gave a satisfactory report.

The deed of partnership was dated the 31st of December, 1900, and recited that it had been agreed that the defendant should purchase a third share of Atkinson's business, including profits of offices and appointments held by Atkinson, for £1,500, which was paid on the execution of the deed. It then provided that Atkinson and the defendant should become partners in the profession of solicitors and conveyancers in continuation of the business carried on for many years by Atkinson, from the 1st day of December, 1900, during their joint lives under the style or firm of Atkinson & Patterson, and that neither partner should enter into any engagements on behalf of the firm except in its name. Under this deed the benefit of the contract between Atkinson and the plaintiffs re Coleman would form part of the partnership profits.

On the 5th of February, 1901, Atkinson gave notice in writing to the plaintiffs that he had taken the defendant into partnership, and that the style of the new firm would be Atkinson & Patterson. The plaintiffs received this notice, but paid no attention to it. Their house property manager was called and said that he continued to correspond with Atkinson & Atkinson and ultimately sent them the money to complete Coleman's mortgage because he had no instructions to act otherwise. The money to complete the Coleman mortgage was in fact sent by a cheque dated the 23rd of February, 1901, payable to Atkinson & Atkinson re Coleman or order in a letter dated the 28th of February, 1901, and addressed to Atkinson & Atkinson. The cheque was indorsed "Atkinson & Atkinson," by F. Atkinson, and a receipt signed "Atkinson & Atkinson" was sent to and accepted by the plaintiffs. The money was paid by Atkinson into his own private account and was embezzled by him. The defendant first heard of this Coleman transaction on the 15th of March, 1901, and Atkinson absconded shortly after. No books of the new firm were in fact ever kept, and no partnership account in the name of the new firm was ever opened with any banker, and no payments were made out of Atkinson's account to or for the benefit of the partnership. The name-plate on the door of the office at Hastings was altered, but that at Bexhill was left untouched; but the defendant commenced to attend regularly at Hastings only on or about the 5th of February, 1901, so that little more than five weeks elapsed before Atkinson's dishonesty was discovered. When the Coleman cheque for £360 was paid into Atkinson's account, that account was overdrawn to the extent of about £330, and the balance of £30 by which the account was put in credit was drawn out again in a few days. The defendant had nothing to do with and had no power to draw on this account of Atkinson's.

Under these circumstances the plaintiffs allege that the defendant is liable as a partner, and rely on sections 10 and 11 of the Partnership Acts. [His lordship read the sections, and continued:] Now the liability of partners which is declared by the sections is merely a branch of the law of principal and agent. "Each partner is an agent of the firm and his other partners for the purpose of the business of the partnership" (section 5), and all the partners are liable because the individual partner has acted or contracted as agent for them as either disclosed or undisclosed principals—if disclosed, because the act or contract is avowedly with them or on their behalf; if undisclosed, because the law gives the other contracting party the option of proceeding against the undisclosed principal when discovered. But where A., knowing B. and C. to be partners, refuses to contract with them jointly and insists on contracting with B. alone, he cannot afterwards treat C. as liable. "Where a man has an option to choose one or other of two inconsistent things, once he has made his election it cannot be retracted; it is final and cannot be altered. Quod semel placuit in electionibus ampliuis displicere non potest," per Lord Blackburn in Scarfe v. Jardine, 30 W. R. 893, at p. 897, 7 App. Cas. 345, at p. 360. The several liability of B. is a totally distinct thing from the joint liability of B. and C. A. had his option which he would accept and he elected to accept B.'s several liability. The same principles apply to a contract made between A. and B. where B. subsequently takes C. into partnership and gives A. notice thereof. The question then becomes one of novation—has the original contract been discharged by the the acceptance of the new liability? I take the law as stated in Lindley on Partnership (5th ed.

239. A. is, of course, not bound to accept the liability of B. and C. in discharge of that of B., and if he gave express notice that he refused to do so he would have finally elected to abide by the original agreement, but "he is not bound to elect at once. He may wait and think which way he will exercise his election so long as he can do so without injuring other persons": Scarfe v. Jardine.

The questions that I have to decide are (1) did the plaintiffs before action elect either to abide by their original contract or to adopt the new firm as their solicitors in Coleman's matter in lieu of Atkinson, and (2) if not, can they so elect by the writ or now at the bar. In my opinion the plaintiffs prior to the writ elected to stand by their original contract; they knew of the change in the firm, but they did not merely continue to address their letters to Atkinson & Atkinson but they actually sent the money to Atkinson & Atkinson payable to the order of Atkinson & Atkinson, and accepted a receipt from Atkinson & Atkinson. Indeed, it was hardly contended that they had novated before action, but it was urged that it was still open to them to elect, and thus the issue of the writ was an election to novate. In my opinion this is not so, but the payment of the whole money to Atkinson operated as an election to abide by the original contract, and being once made could not afterwards be retracted. But even if this were not so they could not, in my opinion, now elect to make the defendant liable. The principle applicable is the same as that which is applied by the court in the case of an undisclosed principal. It is true that the party who contracted with the agent can sue the principal when discovered, but this is subject to the qualification that nothing has occurred in the meantime to make it unjust. "If the principal has paid the agent, or if the state of the accounts between the agent and the principal would make it unjust that the seller should call on the principal, the fact of payment on such state of accounts would be an answer to the action brought by the seller where he had looked to the responsibility of the agent": per Bayley, J., Thompson v. Davenport, 9 B. & C. 78, at p. 89. It would, in my opinion, be manifestly unjust to allow the plaintiffs to deal with Atkinson alone so long as a payment was to be made by them, and to allow them to elect to deal with Atkinson & Patterson when the liability for the sum so paid to Atkinson alone came in question. The plaintiffs relied on the sections of the Partnership Act, to which I have referred, but that Act is declaratory only. It states the law as it affects partners in relation to third persons under ordinary conditions, and in the absence of special circumstances. It in no wise affects the acts or defaults of third persons contracting with the partners or any individual member of the firm. It is said that the case of the defendant falls within the exact terms of sections 10 and 11 (a) inasmuch as Atkinson was "acting in the ordinary course of the business of the firm" (section 10), and "acting within the scope of his apparent authority" (section 11 (a)); but even if this were so, the plaintiffs' contention would involve the introduction of some such words as these: "Notwithstanding that the person complaining has declined to contract with or recognize the partner as partner." But the words of the Act do not refer to the rights and liabilities of the partners inter se in the abstract, but only in relation to contracts made with or acts done to the detriment of third persons, and those third persons must be persons who are dealing with the partner as such or who are in a position to elect to deal with the partner as such or to treat his wrongful act as the act of a partner. In my opinion the defendant does not come within the words of the Act, because I do not think that it is open to a third person to assert that the individual with whom he has intentionally contracted as an individual on his several contract, or with whom he has elected to continue as on a contract with an individual, can be heard to say that such person was acting in the ordinary course of the business of the firm or was acting within the scope of his apparent authority, when he knew that he was not acting or appearing to act for the firm at all, and he preferred to have it so. Further, in my opinion, section 11 (b) had no application, because, under the circumstances, I think it impossible to hold that the firm of Atkinson & Patterson did, in fact, receive money or property of the plaintiffs. The cheque was, as I have said, drawn payable to Atkinson & Atkinson, was intentionally sent in a letter addressed to Atkinson & Atkinson, and was paid into the account of Atkinson alone, and was received and dealt with by Atkinson alone. The plaintiffs' action fails and must be dismissed with costs.

Broome v. Speak. (a.)

Company—Prospectus—Contract by company—Omission from prospectus—Rights to be "honourably met"—Cancelled contract—Cancelling contract—Untrue statement—Companies Act, 1867 (30 & 31 Vict. c 131), s. 38—Directors' Liability Act, 1890 (53 & 54 Vict. c. 64), s. 3.

By an agreement of the 9th of May, 1898, a promoter agreed to float a company for a sum equal to one per cent. on its nominal capital. Subsequently it was resolved to purchase the business of another company as a going concern, and the company, by a letter of the 21st of September, a resolution of the 1st of October, and a letter of the 1st of October, entered into a contract with the promoter by which the promoter agreed to advance the sum of £14,250, which was required as a deposit in respect of the purchase, and the company agreed to repay him that amount together with a commission of £7,500. The agreement of purchase was signed on the 26th of September. The directors of the vendor company, some of whom were to join the board of the new company, objected to the payment of the £7,500. The promoter was accordingly assured that his right to receive proper remuneration for commission would be honourably met, and, with his consent, the contract contained in the letter of the 21st of September was cancelled by a resolution of the 10th of October and a letter of the 18th of October. Subsequently the directors issued a prospectus in which it was stated, on the advice of counsel, that the only contracts to which the company was a party were those of the 9th of May and the 26th of September.

Held, that the contract to pay the promoter the commission of £7,500 contained in the letter of the 21st of September, the resolution of the 1st of October, and the letter of the 1st of October was not wholly cancelled by the contract contained in the resolution of the 10th of October and the letter of the 18th of October, and that in any event both contracts should have been disclosed in the prospectus under section 38 of the Companies Act, 1867, and that the statement in the prospectus that the only contracts to which the company was a party were those of the 9th of May and the 26th of September was a false statement within the Directors' Liability Act, 1890.

(a.) Reported by H. L. Ormiston, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Held, also, that the fact that the contracts were omitted from the prospectus on the advice of counsel was no defence to an action under either statute.

Action with witnesses.

This was an action brought by a shareholder against the chairman, Mr. Paul Speak, and two of the directors, Messrs. Shepheard and Clayton, of the London and Northern Bank (Limited), to recover damages in respect of the non-disclosure of certain contracts in a prospectus on the faith of which the plaintiff took shares.

The company, which was incorporated in April, 1898, did not originally contemplate the acquisition of any existing business.

Under an agreement dated the 9th of May, 1898, Mr. Bowden, the promoter, was to receive for promotion expenses a sum equal to 1 per cent. on the then nominal capital of the company.

Subsequently it was resolved to purchase the business of the Leeds Joint Stock Bank. The Leeds directors demanded a deposit of £14,250, and this amount Bowden agreed to advance.

On the 21st of September, 1898, a letter was written on behalf of the bank to Mr. Craig (who was Bowden's nominee for this purpose), undertaking to repay the amount of the deposit, together with £7,500 bonus for the loan.

On the 26th of September the agreement for the agreement for the purchase of the Leeds Bank was signed, and the £14,250 was deposited.

On the 1st of October the agreement to repay the amount of the deposit and to pay the bonus of £7,500 to Craig was adopted at a meeting of the board, and a letter to that effect was sent on behalf of the bank to Craig.

At a meeting of the board on the 10th of October, at which some of the Leeds directors were present, the question of the payment of the bonus to Bowden was discussed. Two of the Leeds directors—Messrs. Bray and Gaunt—were very hostile to the proposal and refused to go on with the purchase unless it was abandoned. When this was pointed out to Bowden, and also that if he persisted in his demand he stood to lose, not only the amount of the deposit, but also the money which he was to receive under the promotion agreement, he consented to the cancellation of the contract contained in the letter of the 21st of September. At the same meeting a resolution was passed in the following terms: "That after full discussion and hearing the views of the directors of the Leeds Joint Stock Bank (Limited), and upon the chairman giving Mr. Bowden assurance that his right to receive proper remuneration for commission on introducing the business of the Leeds Joint Stock Bank Co. (Limited), and raising the necessary deposit, shall be honourably met at a future meeting of the directors of the London and Northern Bank (Limited), it is resolved, with the assent of Mr. Craig, that the contract contained in the letter of the 21st of September, 1898, be cancelled, and that the subject be adjourned to a future meeting of the board."

On the 18th of October Craig wrote to the trustee of the London and Northern Bank a letter as follows: "Referring to the letter which you wrote to me, dated the 21st of September, 1898, I understand that the directors of the London and Northern Bank have passed a resolution to the effect that the claim which I may have for commission in introducing the business of the Leeds Joint Stock Bank (Limited) or for raising the necessary deposit shall be honourably and properly met. Having regard to that assurance, I am quite willing to agree to the terms of your letter to me being cancelled and the arrangement there suggested as being considered at an end."

On the 24th of October the prospectus was issued. On the advice of counsel reference to the cancelled contract of the 21st of September, 1898, was omitted, and it was stated that the only contracts to which the bank was a party were the promotion agreement and the purchase agreement.

On the faith of the prospectus the plaintiff applied for, and was allotted, shares in the bank. Subsequently the bank went into liquidation, and the plaintiff brought the present action.

Astbury, K.C., and J. Roskill, for the plaintiff.—The effect of the resolution of the 10th of October and the letter of the 18th of October was only to vary the contract to repay the deposit money and to pay the bonus to Bowden, by leaving the amount of the bonus to the discretion of the directors. The cancellation was that of a document which fixed the amount; it could only take effect by way of accord and satisfaction; if Bowden was to have no legal right to receive anything, there could be no accord and satisfaction, and, consequently, no cancellation: Bayley v. Homan, 3 Bing. N. C. 915. The contract, therefore, with its subsequent variation, should have been disclosed in the prospectus. Even assuming that contract to have been cancelled, the cancelling contract, that is to say, the resolution of the 10th of October, was a subsisting contract, and should have been disclosed. The statement in the prospectus that the only contracts to which the bank was a party were the promotion agreement and the agreement for the purchase of the Leeds Bank, was untrue to the knowledge of the defendants, and renders them liable to pay compensation to the plaintiff under the Directors' Liability Act, 1890.

Haldane, K.C., and F. Cassel, for the defendant Shepheard.—The consideration for Bowden giving up his rights was that the purchase of the Leeds Bank should go through and that he should get his promotion money, the payment of which was conditional on the successful flotation of the company. Apart from the resolution of the 1st of October he could not have enforced his right to the payment of the bonus, for he was a promoter, and was, therefore, dealing with himself. After the resolution of the 10th of October cut away his legal right to the £7,500, all that remained was a relationship of honour; where this is the case there is no question of a quantum meruit. We rely on Taylor v. Brewer, 1 M. & S. 290; Roberts v. Smith, 4 H. & N. 315, 7 W. R. C. L. Dig. 54, and the dissenting judgment of Parke, B., in Bryant v. Flight, 5 M. & W. 114. The obligation to repay Bowden the amount of the deposit remained, but it rested on the implied contract contained in the agreement to purchase the Leeds Bank. Even if the directors were wrong in their construction of the resolution of the 10th of October, that construction was arrived at on the advice of counsel; they honestly thought that the resolution did not amount to a contract, and the principle of Cooper v. Phibbs, 15 W. R. 1049, L. R. 2 H. L. 149, and Earl Beauchamp v. Winn, L. R. 6 H. L. 223, 21 W. R. Dig. 269, applies. It cannot, therefore, be said that they issued a prospectus with knowledge of the existence of a contract within the section: Twycross v. Grant, 25 W. R. 586, 2 C. P. D. 469, at p. 482. Only material contracts are within section 38, and cancelled contracts are not material. The cancelling resolution was not a contract at all, but a waiver. Our case under the Directors' Liability Act is even stronger, for the directors had a reasonable ground for believing the statement in the prospectus to be true.

Eldon Bankes, K.C., and O. L. Clare, for the defendant Speak.—Section 38 only contemplates executory contracts.

Warmington, K.C., and Hon. F. Russell, for the defendant Clayton.

Astbury, K.C., in reply.—The words "properly met," in the letter of the 18th of October, show that Bowden understood the resolution of the 10th of October to mean that he was to have a quantum meruit. If this was not the case, he could still have sued on the subsisting contract. In any case it takes a contract to cancel a contract: Goss v. Lord Nugent, 5 B. & Ad. 58, at p. 65. The only contracts which need not be disclosed are those which are not material: Sullivan v. Mitcalfe, 29 W. R. 181, 5 C. P. D. 455. The contracts in question are most material.

BUCKLEY, J.—I consider that the prospectus must be deemed fraudulent on the part of the defendants. [His lordship here stated the facts:] Now I go back to the minute of the 10th of October. The question here to be determined is whether on the 10th of October there was not created another contract to which the company was a party by the resolution passed on that date. It is contended by the defendants that the meaning and result of this resolution was that Mr. Bowden, when he left that meeting, was to leave it in such a position as not to be entitled as of right to a single penny—that he was to throw himself upon the honour or good feeling or generosity of the board as to whether he was to have anything or nothing. Now I do not think that was the result of it. The chairman at the meeting, as the price of the destruction of the letter of the 21st of September, gave Mr. Bowden an assurance. It seems to me that in doing that he was acting as representing the board, or to speak more correctly, as representing the bank. Now was that assurance one under which Mr. Bowden was to give up everything provided they were minded to give him nothing? I think not. Mr. Bowden had stood in peril; he had found the £14,250, and he stood in peril of losing that altogether. But was it likely that he was to have no rights at all reserved to him by this alteration as regards the letter of the 21st of September? I think not. If that was meant, why did not the minute say so? Why does it not express in so many words that he is to throw himself upon the generosity of the board and have no rights? It is admitted on all hands that he was possibly to get something, and the question argued is, was he to get a quantum meruit—that is to say, was he to have the right to what was fair, or was he to rest only upon a promise with a discretion in the directors as to whether they would give him anything or nothing? Now, looking first to the language of the resolution, and thinking of what the situation was, I think the intention was to reserve him a right. The language is this: the assurance is "that his right to receive proper remuneration" for something "shall be honourably met." The defendants seek to say that those words mean that there shall survive to him only a debt of honour, a debt resting at the discretion of the board. That is not consistent with the language, and, I think, not consistent with the position of the parties as they stood at that time. I think that they intended, and that Mr. Bowden acted upon, the footing that his right to receive something was admitted. What was proper was not admitted, and as regards the question of amount, that was left to honour in this sense, that it was to be a fair and proper sum, not a sum to be paid only as a debt of honour, but a fair and proper sum. For the purpose of construing the language of this resolution, I cannot read the letter to explain it, but I feel myself fortified in giving that meaning to the words when I find that on the 18th of October a letter which Mr. Craig was asked to sign, and which had been drafted in point of fact by the solicitors in counsel's chambers, varied this word "honourably" by saying "honourably and properly met." [His lordship then referred to the evidence as supporting this construction of the resolution, and continued:] Now with that I want to go on to consider quite shortly what is the law that I ought to apply to this, having regard to the cases of Taylor v. Brewer, Bryant v. Flight, and Roberts v. Smith. What I have to look to on these authorities is this: was this a mere promise, leaving it to the discretion of the promisor to say what the figure was to be, or was it a contract upon which Bowden could have sued? In Taylor v. Brewer, in 1813, the words were to the effect "Such remuneration as shall be deemed right," and in Roberts v. Smith, in 1859, "Any remuneration you may think me deserving of." In both those cases it was held that an action would not lie. In Bryant v. Flight, in 1839, the words were "The amount of payment I leave entirely to you." It was held that an action would lie, but Parke, B., dissented. Now all of those cases were considered the other day in the Court of Appeal, in the case of Loftus v. Roberts, 18 Times L. R. 532, and Vaughan Williams, L.J., sums them up by saying this: "The decision in the first of these cases and the third, and the dissentient view of Parke, B., in the second, was this—that wherever words which by themselves constituted a promise were accompanied by words which showed that the promisor was to have a discretion or option as to whether he would carry out that which purported to be the promise, the result was that there was no contract on which an action could be brought at all. The doctrine was an old one. In Leake on Contracts (3rd ed.), p. 3, it was expressed thus: "Promissory expressions reserving an option as to the performance do not create a contract."

Now, that being the law which I have to apply, what is the effect of this resolution? To my mind it is not to constitute a promise with a discretion in the promisor. There existed at its date a legal obligation as between the bank and Bowden. That was to be put an end to so far as the payment of the £7,500 was concerned, but what was to be substituted for it was this, that the right of Bowden to receive something was to be admitted; the amount that he was to receive was not admitted, but what might be a proper amount was to be honourably paid in the sense, as I understand it, that he was to be fairly and reasonably dealt with. For those reasons I come to the conclusion that the minute of the 10th of October, 1898, produced another contract.

Now with that I must go to the law. In the first place, it has been argued before me that section 38 of the Companies Act, 1867, does not extend beyond executory contracts. I think that is not so. Section 38, of course, has always created very considerable difficulty in knowing what is the proper limit to be put upon the very wide effect of the generality of the expressions; but I see no reason for cutting down the words "contracts entered into by the company" so as to exclude a material contract entered into by the company, although, in point of fact, that contract may have been wholly executed. Suppose a contract between a promoter and every member of the board, that a promoter will pay an intending director £1,000 for serving on the board, and that in return for that the director shall allow himself to be appointed one of the first directors, and suppose that the money has been paid, and that the director has joined the board, and that the contract is wholly executed, it seems to me that that would still be a contract entered into by a promoter as such and a director before the issue of the prospectus, and that it would be a material contract, and I see no reason for cutting down the language of the section so as to exclude that. Again, supposing a contract for the sale of property of any kind from A. to B., and that that has been wholly executed by a conveyance by A. to C. by the direction of B., but B.'s name does not appear on the prospectus; and suppose that B.'s name was one which, as being that of the promoter, or for some reason or other, would have been naturally looked at by the intending investor, and if he had known that B. was interested in the matter it might have influenced him in taking shares; why is not that executed contract, which certainly was entered into by the promoter or director in the case which I am supposing, and possibly by the company, not within the words "contract entered into," because it has been completed by a conveyance, if the disclosure of B.'s name would have been material? To take another illustration, supposing there is a contract, and a material contract, running, say, for a period of five years which has expired, it is a contract entered into by the company, and I see no reason for restricting the generality of the language of the section so as to exclude it.

Now, what I have been addressing myself to so far is the contract contained in the letter of the 21st of September and the letter of the 1st of October. It is true that at the date when the prospectus was issued —at least, I will assume for the moment that it is true—that had been put an end to, but it was a material contract, and I think as such it ought to have been disclosed, and the prospectus ought to have contained the dates and the names of the parties to those three transactions—namely, the letter of the 21st of September, the minute of the 1st of October, and the letter of the 1st of October. But now, further, by the minute of the 10th of October and the letter of the 18th of October another contract was entered into—namely, a contract cancelling the previous contract or cancelling it to some extent. Now that was a subsisting contract at the date of the prospectus, and why should it not have been disclosed? It appears to me again that that is within the section. They would have been required to disclose the three matters by date and parties—the 21st of September, two of the 1st of October, one of the 10th of October, and one of the 18th of October. I think both of those are matters which ought to have been disclosed within section 38. Then, thirdly, it seems to me that the letter of the 21st of September was not cancelled by what took place on the 10th and 18th of October. It contained two parts—the obligation to return the deposit and the obligation to pay the bonus. As regards the latter, it was put an end to, but as regards the former, it was not; it was a subsisting contract. The witnesses are all agreed as to that. The company still remained bound to repay the £14,250 deposit; and again, as regards that, I think it was a subsisting contract, and as such ought to have been disclosed.

Then, lastly, if I am right in the view which I take as regards the effect of the minute of the 10th of October, that created a new obligation; not a mere debt of honour, but something which was binding on the company, and which, therefore, was a contract, and that again, I think, ought to have been disclosed under section 38.

Now it is true that section 38 of the Act of 1867 has been repealed by section 33 of the Act of 1900; but, having regard to section 38 of 52 & 53 Vict. c. 63 (Interpretation Act, 1889), it seems to me that—in point of fact the defendants have not disputed it —the plaintiff's right in this action is a right acquired, accrued, or incurred under that repealed enactment, and that this legal proceeding can be instituted as if the repealing Act had not been passed. It seems to me, therefore, that here the plaintiff is in a position to avail himself of the statutory fraud arising upon section 38 of the Companies Act, 1867, and I think he succeeds upon that statutory fraud.

There are two other matters upon which the action might fall to be decided. First, the Directors' Liability Act of 1890. Now upon that what one has to investigate is whether there was an untrue statement in the prospectus or notice made without reasonable ground of belief in the directors that the statement was true. For the purposes of that Act I think that "an untrue statement" means a statement in fact untrue, not a statement in the belief of the directors untrue. You have to see what the real facts are. Now what were the real facts here as regards this? The real facts, if I am right, of course, in the conclusion at which I have arrived, are that all the several contracts which I have mentioned were subsisting contracts, and that the company was a party to them; but as regards the contract for cancellation of the contract of the 21st of September, it does not seem to me possible to say that that was not a contract in the sense of being a subsisting contract, and it was said that that contract did not exist. That was untrue in point of fact. That also this was untrue in point of fact; the agreement of the 21st of September had created an obligation to repay the deposit of £14,250, and that had never been disclosed. That remained, and that was a contract, and it was untrue to say that the company was not a party to a contract for the repayment of the £14,250. So that there were, I think, other statements which were in fact untrue.

Then had the directors reason to believe, and did they believe that those statements were true? Now here, speaking as regards Mr. Shepheard, I do not for a moment impute as against him that he was stating anything which was untrue in any belief that it was untrue. I acquit him altogether of any fraudulent intent or improper action in the matter, but in point of fact he had no reason to believe that the cancellation contract had been put an end to, because it had not. I do not suppose that he ever addressed his mind to the point. That is the real answer to it. The contract existed, and he did not think or inquire, I suppose, at all as to whether that was a thing which was in existence or not. He did protect himself in this way, that he went to counsel, and counsel said that the prospectus could be issued as it was—having regard to the rescission of the contract, it would do. But counsel cannot protect directors by telling them that they need not comply with the Act of Parliament if they ought to comply with it. The question is simply one of fact, whether the contract existed or not; if it did exist, then the statute applied. It seems to me, therefore, that under the Directors' Liability Act also it is only a statutory fraud, but it is a fraud by reason of the statute. [His lordship then dealt with the action so far as it was based on common law fraud.]

K. B. Div. (Phillimore, J.) June 18.

HUNTER v. THE KING. (a.)

Revenue — Income tax — Life policy — Exemption on premiums—Assurance company agreed to return half of each of the first seven premiums paid as loans to the assured on interest—Such advances treated as first charge on policy—Actual premium paid—Income Tax Act, 1853 (16 & 17 Vict. c. 34), s. 4, Schedules D, E.

By the terms of a policy issued by an assurance company the assured had the option of receiving back by way of loan at interest from the company half of each of the first seven years' premium paid by him in respect of an assurance he had effected on his own life, the money so advanced to him being a first charge on the capital money of the policy.

The assured having elected to exercise the option, paid £66 17*s.* 6*d.*, the first premium, and received back as a loan £33.

Held, that the amount which the assured had paid in premium was £66 17*s.* 6*d.*, and that he was entitled to claim exemption from income tax on the whole of that sum.

This was a special case stated and agreed between the suppliant and his Majesty's Attorney-General, raising a question of law which was decided by Phillimore, J., sitting for a Divisional Court.

The facts set out in the case were as follows: The suppliant, R. L. Hunter, a solicitor and a member of the firm of Messrs. Hunter & Haynes, by a policy of insurance dated the 30th of June, 1896, effected an insurance on his life with the London Life Association (Limited) in the sum of £1,500. The policy recited that the sum of £66 17s. 6d. (including an advance of £33), being the premium for such insurance until the 30th of June, 1897, had been paid to the association. By clause 1 of the policy it was provided that a portion of the renewal premium—viz., £33—should, if the assured should so desire, be advanced by the association and should be a first charge on the policy. Clause 4 of the policy provided that the association might at any time advance moneys for payment of any sum necessary to prevent the lapsing or avoidance of the policy, and that any such advances should bear interest at 6 per cent. per annum, reducible to 4 per cent. on punctual payment, and that any such advances and interest should be a first charge on the policy and the sum assured.

The form of receipt received by Mr. Hunter on the 30th of June, 1896, was as follows: "Received this the 30th day of June, 1896, the sum of £66 17s. 6d. (including £33 advanced by the association), being the first premium on an insurance of £1,500 effected on the life of Mr. R. L. Hunter, for which a policy, numbered 30,540, and dated as above, will be issued in due course." The receipt for the next and following year acknowledged the receipt of "£66 17s. 6d., being the amount of one year's premium."

On the 19th of July, 1897, the suppliant entered into an agreement with the association whereby, in consideration of the loan to him in the previous year of £33, and in consideration of five further sums of the same amount to be advanced to him under the terms of the policy of assurance, the suppliant charged the policy and all money and benefits thereby assured as security for repayment to the association of the principal sums advanced and to be advanced with interest at 6 per cent. per annum, reducible to 4 per cent. on punctual payment, and also covenanted to pay the premium and all other moneys required for keeping up the policy as the same should become payable.

No advance in cash was made by the association to the suppliant, and save so far as the same could be gathered from the suppliant having made a proposal for a half premium policy, from his having accepted the same, and from the terms of the charge, no specific request was made by the suppliant that the association would make an advance and no receipt in respect of any alleged advance was given by the suppliant to the association.

The only moneys which passed from the suppliant to the association in respect of payment of payment of premium was a payment in cash of £33 17s. 6d. only, and no other moneys were received by the association in respect of the same beyond that sum, but the suppliant was indebted in the loan register with the amount of the principal sums secured by the charge, and was indebted in the renewal premium register with the full amount of the premium separately entered into in two sums of £33 17s. 6d. and £33 respectively, the sum of £33 having against it the remark "On credit. . . ." The premiums were treated as having been paid in full under the heading "premiums" in the revenue account of the association published each year pursuant to the Life Assurance Companies Act, 1870, and in the calculation made for the reduction of the premiums subsequent to the seventh, while the principal sums secured by the charge were included in the balance-sheet published pursuant to the Act under the head "loans on the association's policies (with their surrender value)."

Section 4 of the Income Tax Act, 1853, provides that "any person who shall have made an insurance of his life . . . shall be entitled to deduct the amount of the annual premium paid by him for such insurance or contract from any profits or gains in respect of which he shall be liable to be assessed under section D or E of this Act."

The question for the opinion of the court was whether the suppliant was entitled, in any of the years from 1896 to 1899, to deduct from his assessment, or to obtain relief in respect of £66 17s. 6d. as being the annual sum paid by him in respect of premium within the meaning of section 54 of the Income Tax Act, 1854, he having been only allowed relief by the Commissioners for General Purposes to the extent of £33 17s. 6d., the sum actually paid by him in respect of the premiums.

The suppliant originally lodged a petition of right claiming payment of the sum of £3 6s., being the income tax chargeable on the sum of £33 for the three years in question.

The Attorney-General consented, in order to obtain the decision of the court in the promptest way, to waive any objection made as a matter of law that a petition of right did not lie, but such waiver was not to be taken as a precedent in other cases.

PHILLIMORE, J.—In this case the question I have to decide is, what is the annual premium which the suppliant has made in respect of his life policy? Nominally he has paid £66 17s. 6d., and in hard cash he has only paid £33. In these circumstances he contends that he is nevertheless entitled to deduct the nominal value of the premium—namely, £66 17s. 6d. from the amount upon which his income tax was assessed, while on the other hand the Crown says that as to £33 of the larger sum there has been no payment within the terms of the section of the Act, and he is only entitled to claim exemption on the balance or actual sum he paid in cash. No doubt, as the Attorney-General contended, it is impossible to look at the policy without seeing that the association held out as a special inducement the fact that if the assured so wished half of the nominal premium could in fact remain unpaid for a time, the unpaid part being debited against the assured and being treated as a first charge on the capital money. When the arrangement between Mr. Hunter and the association was made, Mr. Hunter elected to accept this offer and in fact only paid £33, but he gave a charge for that amount and he agreed to pay interest on it and gave his personal contract for its repayment. In my opinion the question is not affected because the money was borrowed from the same office with which the insurance was affected. If the case had been one where the second half of the premium and the interest was never to be paid or might never by the happening of the death of the assured before a certain date become payable, and was but a mere charge on the policy in favour of the association, the case might have been different. In my opinion the amount paid by the suppliant was £66 17s. 6d., and not £33 17s. 6d. by way of premium as alleged by the Crown. It follows, therefore, that the suppliant is entitled to claim exemption from the payment of income tax on the larger sum, and judgment for him for £3 6s. must accordingly be entered, with costs.

Action, Cause of — Contract, Inducing breach of — Justification—Bona fides.

The plaintiff was apprenticed by an indenture to W. & W. as a stonemason, and they employed him as a labourer. By one of certain rules of the trade union of which the plaintiff and the defendants were members, and which rules W. & W. were parties to, it was provided "That boys entering the trade shall not work more than three months without being legally bound apprentice, and in no case to be more than sixteen years of age, except masons' sons and stepsons. Employers to have one apprentice to every four masons on an average." The plaintiff was twenty-five years of age when employed by W. & W. The defendants threatened to withdraw the men employed by W. & W., those men being members of the trade union, if the plaintiff was taught the art of a stonemason, and in consequence there was a breach of the contract entered into between the plaintiff and W. & W. The plaintiff brought an action against the defendants for procuring such breach.

Held, on appeal from the county court judge, who gave judgment for the defendants, that the plaintiff would have a cause of action against the defendants unless they showed they were justified in interfering with his contractual rights; such justification for interference with the plaintiff's right must be an equal or superior right in themselves, and it would not be sufficient for them to show that they had acted on a wrong understanding of their rights or without malice, or bonâ fide, or in the best interests of themselves.

(a.) Reported by E. G. STILLWELL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Appeal from his Honour Judge Eardley Wilmot, sitting at the Ipswich County Court. The facts were thus stated in the written judgment read by Darling, J.:

In this case the plaintiff sued the defendants for wrongfully and maliciously procuring to be broken an indenture of apprenticeship dated the 1st of June, 1900, and made between the plaintiff of the one part, and Wigg & Wright, monumental masons, of the other part; and for unlawfully and maliciously conspiring together to procure the said indenture to be broken, and for unlawfully and maliciously conspiring together to molest and injure the plaintiff in his trade or calling, and for otherwise committing or procuring violations of the legal rights of the plaintiff. The plaintiff claimed damages and an injunction. The case was heard before a county court judge on the 22nd of January last, and the facts, so far as they are before us, appear to be these: By a deed of apprenticeship dated the 11th of August, 1900, the plaintiff was bound to Wigg & Wright for three years as an apprentice stonemason. He was employed and paid by them as a labourer, and was not learning the trade of a mason. All the men employed by Wigg & Wright were members of the trade union of which all the defendants are members. Wigg & Wright were parties to the rules of that trade union, and had signed them. Of those rules, No. 6 is as follows:

"That boys entering the trade shall not work more than three months without being legally bound apprentice, and in no case to be more than sixteen years of age, except masons' sons and stepsons. Employers to have one apprentice to every four masons on an average."

The letter of the 20th of May, 1900, written by Wigg & Wright to the defendant Moss as secretary to the trade union, and his reply of the 22nd of May, sufficiently explain what was the action of the defendants as against Wigg & Wright when read together with defendants' answers to interrogatories 4 and 8. The letter of the 20th of May was in the following terms:—

"Dear Sir,—As it appears we have inadvertently taken an apprentice contrary to the rules of your society (for which we are very sorry) we should be glad to give an explanation of how it occurred, as we had no intention whatever of infringing the rules. We had taken an apprentice before on the same condition, with the exception of age, and note the rule says: 'And in no case to be more than sixteen years of age, except masons' sons and stepsons.' Now, this seems to us to entirely do away with limit of age providing they are masons' sons. What else can it mean? The fact seems to be this rule wants revising and made plainer, so that there could be no mistakes in future. When Mr. Read spoke to me about taking his son as an apprentice I told him we were not entitled to take another apprentice, but he said, 'Oh, yes, you can take him, being a mason's son.' Now, this, coming from a member of the society, we took it to be the meaning of the rule, and we never heard a word to the contrary. If we had we should certainly not have taken this one. Well, now he has been bound just a year. We don't know if we are legally bound to keep him, being over age, and we should not be at all sorry to get rid of him, although we should wish to behave honourably in the matter, and it seems to us the best way out of the difficulty would be to let him finish his time out, and we hope you will be able to view the matter in the same light, as we should be exceedingly sorry that there should be any unpleasantness between us and the society."

The letter was signed, "Pro Wigg & Wright, W. B. Wigg."

The reply, dated the 22nd of May, and signed by the secretary of the society, was as follows:

"Your letter of the 20th was laid before the members of my society on that date, and I am instructed to inform you that you have misunderstood the meaning of the rule. It admits of a mason's son learning the trade without being bound apprentice, but we cannot understand a man of twenty-five or twenty-six years of age claiming that right, nor an employer who would take him without first consulting us. Had you done so we should have expressed our intentions in the matter at once plainly. As the matter stands, we regret your firm has placed itself in a difficult position, but my members consider your action a direct infringement of the rules, and if the man in question starts working at the trade we are bound to protest against you for introducing an individual not of the trade, and in accordance with our general rule we have empowered our members working for your firm to take prompt action in the matter. We regret the thing has occurred, but we feel that the blame does not rest with us in any way."

The answers to interrogatories were as follows:

"4. (a) At a meeting held the 21st of May, 1900, it was reported to the meeting that there was a man working at Wigg & Wright's named Mr. Read, bringing a mallet and tools, stating that he was going to be an apprentice, but he was still working as a labourer, but if he should start at the bunker (it was noted on the minutes that) brother Turner had a right to report the same. (b) At an ordinary fortnightly meeting held the 13th of August, 1900, it was reported that Mr. Read had been made an apprentice, but had not started masonry. It was resolved that if he started work two hours' notice should be given to Wigg & Wright by members working there. (c) At an ordinary meeting held on the 20th of May, 1901, it was resolved that the secretary write to Wigg & Wright respecting L. Read entering the trade, his age being twenty-five years. (d) The fortnightly meeting held on the 29th of July, 1901, was specially summoned in consequence of J. Read writing his intention of visiting the meeting; resolutions were passed as follows: 'That J. Read be admitted to the lodge on his consenting to be duly read in as a member; that J. Read be allowed fifteen minutes to state his case of complaint re his son; that after hearing the explanations and arguments of brother Read this society does not see any reason to recede from the position taken up by the society in the letter dated the 24th of May sent to Wigg & Wright.'"

"8. The prompt action referred to in my letter of the 22nd of May, 1901, was that the masons in Messrs. Wigg & Wright's employ should give two hours' notice and leave Messrs. Wigg & Wright's employ if they thought fit."

The plaintiff was not taught the trade of a mason in consequence of the action taken by the defendants.

Henlé, for the plaintiff.—The county court judge was wrong. The defendants were not justified in interfering with the plaintiff's contractual right with Wigg & Wright: Quinn v. Leathem, ante, p. 139, [1901] A. C. 495; Allen v. Flood, 46 W. R. 259, [1898] A. C. 1. Even if there were a binding contract between the defendants and Wigg & Wright the defendants would not be entitled to insist on such contract being carried out to the detriment of the plaintiff: Temperton v. Russell, 41 W. R. 565, [1893] 1 Q. B. 715; Bowen v. Hall, 29 W. R. 367, 6 Q. B. D. 333; Lumley v. Gye, 1 W. R. 432, 2 E. & B. 216.

He also cited The Mayor, &c., of Bradford v. Pickles, 44 W. R. 190, [1895] A. C. 587.

Chester Jones, for the defendants.—The defendants were entitled to insist upon the contract between themselves and Wigg & Wright being carried out, even though it should be to the detriment of the plaintiff. Where a person enters into contracts with different parties and such contracts turn out to be inconsistent with each other, either party may insist upon the fulfilment of his particular contract, and if in consequence there follows a breach of the other party's contract, such party has no right of action against the party whose conduct induced such breach.

Henlé replied.

Cur. adv. vult.

May 3.—DARLING, J. (having stated the facts, as above set out, read the following written judgment of himself and CHANNELL, J.).—The learned county court judge held that the facts as proved or admitted before him fell short of giving any ground of action against the defendants, that the defendants seemed to have acted bonâ fide in the best interests of the society of masons, and were not in any way actuated by improper motives, that the defendants gave a certain interpretation to rule 6 and acted upon it, and that though their interpretation may or may not have been correct, yet, as it was honestly held, he did not consider they had acted improperly in their method of enforcing it. It appears to me that this view is wrong, and that there should be a new trial. To my mind the case presents itself thus. The plaintiff had entered into a contract which entitled him to demand of Wigg & Wright that they should teach him the trade of a stonemason. That was his contractual right. To interfere with that right may give a cause of action against him who does so. For this proposition there is much unquestionable authority, but it is enough to cite these words from the judgment of Lord Macnaghten, in Quinn v. Leathem, 50 W. R. 139, [1901] A. C. 495, at p. 510: "A violation of legal right committed knowingly is a cause of action, and it is a violation of legal right to interfere with contractual relations recognized by law, if there be no sufficient justification for the interference." It was argued before us on behalf of the defendants that they had here such a justification because they had themselves entered into a contract with Wigg & Wright, the terms of which were inconsistent with the contract between Wigg & Wright and the plaintiff. It may well be that a person or many many persons, acting in concert, would have a right to demand the fulfilment of a concert entered into with him or them, even if such fulfilment involved him who performed it in breaking a contract made by him with another person. Many examples might be put. For instance, a man who had affected to sell the same article to two separate purchasers, could not possibly perform one contract without breaking the other, if both insisted upon their rights, yet it would not render the purchaser who insisted on his contractural rights liable at the suit of the other purchaser. But it may well be that the contract here alleged by the defendants is one which, if it were proved, would be by reason of its being in restraint of trade or otherwise illegal, incapable of being enforced, and, in that case, I think that to seek to hold Wigg & Wright to it could not be held "a sufficient justification for the interference with the contractual right of anyone—i.e., in this case, of the plaintiff. Whether there was here a contract between the defendants and Wigg & Wright I do not think sufficiently appears upon the evidence. If in form there were one, it might still be as illegal as I have indicated, and to decide this it would be necessary to consider how far it satisfied the words of Erle, C.J.: "Every person has a right under the law as betwe himself and his fellow subjects to full freedom in disposing of his own labour or his own capital according to his will. It follows that every other person is subject to the correlative duty arising therefrom, and is prohibited from any obstruction to the fullest exercise of this right which can be made compatible with the exercise of similar rights by others." These sentences are expressly adopted by Lord Brampton as part of his judgment in Quinn v. Leathem. It may be that the agreement alleged to exist between Wigg and Wright and the defendant is one which, unlawful otherwise, is legalized by the Trade Union Act, 1871; but that can only appear when it is ascertained exactly what are the terms of that contract and who were the parties to it. Moreover, when all this is ascertained, it may possibly appear that the defendants combined together to do things hurtful to the plaintiff and not necessary to the mere enforcement of their own rights, contractual or otherwise. As to this, the evidence before the county court judge is, I think, not sufficient to enable us to decide. On the new trial the court should have regard to all these considerations. To resume: I think the plaintiff has a cause of action against the defendants unless the court is satisfied that when they interfered with the contractual rights of the plaintiff the defendants had a "sufficient justification for their interference," to use Lord Macnaghten's words. This sufficient justification they may have had and they may prove it; but the facts found by the county court judge and relied on by him as enough do not amount to one, for it is not a justification that "they acted bonâ fide in the best interest of the society of masons"—i.e., in their own interest; nor is it enough that "they were not actuated by improper motives." I think their sufficient justification for interference with the plaintiff's right must be an equal or superior right in themselves, and that no one can legally excuse himself to a man of whose contract he has procured the breach on the ground that he acted on a wrong understanding of his own rights or without malice, or bonâ fide, or in the best interests of himself, nor even that he acted as an altruist seeking only the good of another and careless of his own advantage.

Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J., read the following written judgment: I am clearly of opinion that the judgment of the learned county court judge in this case is not satisfactory, but the question upon which I feel considerable difficulty is whether or not the facts before us enable us finally to determine the question which is raised in the action. The action was brought against the Friendly Society of Operative Stonemasons for maliciously procuring and maliciously conspiring to be broken an indenture of apprenticeship made the 1st of June, 1900, between the plaintiff and the firm of Wigg & Wright, stonemasons, of Ipswich. The facts as I understand them to be agreed and in reality stated by Mr. Chester Jones, who was counsel for the defendants, are as follows: That Read, the plaintiff, being a man of twenty-five years of age, and desirous of improving his capacity for earning wages, entered into the agreement of the 1st of June with Wigg & Wright whereby he covenanted to serve them for a period of three years at the wages of 15s. a week, which were ordinary labourers' wages, and they in their turn covenanted to the best of their skill and ability to teach and instruct him in the trade or business of stone or marble mason, and all things incidental thereto. Wigg & Wright and the men in their employ were members of the defendant society.

Rule 6 of the working rules was in the following terms: [His lordship here read the rule.] The plaintiff entered into Wigg & Wright's service pursuant to the terms of the indenture of apprenticeship, working for them at the specified rate of wages, and, but for the action of the defendants, Wigg & Wright, would have carried out their part of the contract, and would have instructed him in accordance with the undertaking contained in the indenture.

It was stated at the time that the defendants wrote the letters, and took the action to which I am about to refer, Wigg & Wright were employing four masons and had one apprentice besides the plaintiff. In August, 1900, the defendant society resolved that if the plaintiff started work as a mason, or, in other words, if Wigg & Wright commenced to instruct him in accordance with the terms of the indenture, one of their employees was to report the fact to the society within two hours. In consequence of the action of the defendants Wigg & Wright did not employ the plaintiff as a stonemason or instruct him in his trade, and upon the plaintiff remonstrating and asking that they would fulfil their agreement the two letters of the 20th and 22nd of May, 1901, passed, the material part of which is that, in the letter of the 22nd of May, the secretary of the defendant society told Wigg & Wright that they protested against their introducing individuals not in the trade, and had empowered their members working for the firm of Wigg & Wright to take prompt action in the matter. It was agreed that "prompt action" meant that the defendants would authorize their members to give two hours' notice to quit Wigg & Wright's service. It was further stated that the plaintiff was not being taught his trade owing to the action of the defendants. The law in such a case seems to me to be clearly established. It is sufficient to quote the language of Lord Macnaghten already cited by my brother Darling. This was the same principle that was enunciated by Erle, C.J., in Lumley v. Gye, 1 W. R. 432, 2 E. & B. 216, at p. 232, "It is clear that the procurement of the violation of a right is a cause of action in all cases where the violation is an actionable wrong," and expressed by Lord Watson in Allen v. Flood, 46 W. R. 259, [1898] A. C. 1, in these words: "A person who procures the act of another can be made legally responsible for its consequences . . . if he knowingly, for his own ends, induces that other person to commit an actionable wrong." In my opinion the evidence establishes that in this case the defendants, instead of taking action against Wigg & Wright for a supposed breach by them of the contract, if any, embodied in the rules of the association did for their own ends procure and induce Wigg & Wright to commit an actionable wrong—that is to say, to break the terms of a special contract made with the plaintiff. I have some doubt whether the arrangement embodied in the working rules is protected by the Trade Union Act, 1871, but it is possible that the terms of section 3 of that Act are sufficient to prevent us from holding that if the rule amounts to an agreement between Wigg & Wright and the defendants, it is void or voidable. In my opinion the first part of the rule down to the words "sons and stepsons" has no application to the facts of this case. This was the case of a contract made by a man of full age in his own right, and not by or on behalf of a boy. The provisions as to one apprentice to every four masons creates some difficulty, but I think that in that case—assuming the arrangement embodied in the rule to be binding on Wigg & Wright—the defendants had no right to bring pressure to bear or procure Wigg & Wright to break their contract with the plaintiff. Whether they could have taken any other action against Wigg & Wright is a question not before us. There was no evidence to show that the union or any of its members would in any way be injured by the plaintiff being taught his trade, or, in other words, by Wigg & Wright fulfilling their contract with him. The defendants' action was initiated at the lodge meeting of the 13th of August, 1900. The further action on the 13th of May, 1901, was by the secretary of the defendant society, and the action threatened to be taken by Wigg & Wright's men was to be empowered by the defendant society. In my opinion these facts negative any suggestion that the action was taken on behalf of individuals to protect their own interest. For these reasons I think the county court judge ought to have entered judgment for the plaintiff, but as my brothers are not prepared to go so far, there can only be judgment for a new trial.

"THE AUGUSTE LEGEMBRE." (a.)

Admiralty—Salvage—Lifeboat crew—Assistance taken by salvors against consent of master of salved vessel.

Where it was the duty of a tug to tow a lifeboat out to vessels in distress, and the tug assisted in salving such a vessel with the lifeboat made fast to the distressed vessel,

The Court held that the crew of the lifeboat were entitled to be treated in regard to the salvage award as though they formed part of the crew of the tug.

Action.

The plaintiffs were the owners, masters, and crews of the steam tugs Victor and Dragon, of the life steamtug Helen Peele, and the coxswain and crew of the lifeboat Edmund Harvey.

The defendants were the owners of the steamship Auguste Legembre, a French vessel belonging to the port of Algiers.

It appeared that on the 12th of December, 1901, the Auguste Legembre, a vessel of 2,603 tons gross register, and of the value of £11,400, was on a voyage from Barrow-in-Furness to Port Talbot, Glamorgan, in ballast.

On that day she met with very severe weather while off the coast of Cardigan Bay, which resulted in a Manilla warp being washed overboard, which fouled her propellor so that her engines could not be worked. She then drifted to the southward before the force of the gale and apparently touched upon the rocks known as the Hats and Barrels, damaging herself so that in No. 2 hold she made water until it was level with the sea. Some water also appeared to have found its way into the engine-room, the bulkheads being only more or less water tight. In this condition the vessel drifted until she was brought up off the Cornish coast about fifteen miles to the westward of Trevose Head, where she lay throughout the night of the 13th holding to both anchors throughout the 14th in weather which went up to force 10, and at one time to force 11. Although it appeared that no distress signals were exhibited, news of the ship reached the several plaintiffs by telegram, and the Helen Peele (a tug boat belonging to the National Lifeboat Institution, of the value of £10,500) went to her assistance, towing the lifeboat Edmund Harvey, which came from Padstow, and which also belonged to the institution, and was of the value of £1,500. The lifeboat was manned by a crew of eleven hands, and she reached the ship on the evening of the 14th and stood by her till morning. The tugs Victor and Dragon, of the value of £7,000 and £6,000 respectively, also proceeded from Falmouth on the 14th, but the weather was so bad that they had to put back into Mount's Bay and they did not therefore reach the Auguste Legembre until the 15th. However, with the assistance of the three tugs the vessel was brought to Cardiff Roads in safety on the 16th, and it was in respect of these services the claim for salvage was made.

Aspinall, K.C., and Stokes, for the plaintiffs.

Laing, K.C., and Dawson Miller, for the defendants, denied that any salvage services had been rendered by the tug Dragon or the lifeboat Edmund Harvey, and alleged that the Dragon had done what she had done as the employee of the Victor and against the will of master of the Auguste Legembre, and therefore was not entitled to claim salvage services. Further, that the crew of the lifeboat was not employed as salvors at all, but were towed in their lifeboat astern of the salved vessel.

BARNES, J., in giving judgment, said that the property was undoubtedly placed in safety by the efforts of the salvors. The main question was the danger from which the vessel was rescued, and the risks run in effecting that rescue. So far as the weather was concerned there was no doubt that before any actual towage was rendered the wind had abated considerably and the weather was moderate, though there was probably considerable sea still running but going down as the wind fell. He thought it was remarkable that the vessel had ridden out the severe weather and had not dragged her anchors, but notwithstanding that she could not get away from that position, and it was therefore absolutely necessary that she should have towage assistance. The tugs did that satisfactorily, and a reasonable and proper award must be given for that service. But the real question was whether anything ought to be awarded to the men in the lifeboat Edmund Harvey, and to The Dragon. With regard to The Helen Peele, he did not think that the case could be treated exactly as if the eleven men in her owned her. It was said that these men ought to be treated in the same way as an ordinary lifeboat service is treated—namely, to let them take the salvage and run the risk of paying for any damages to the tug or lifeboat. But although it was so to be treated on the present occasion, it did not appear to the court to be very applicable to the case of so large and valuable a tug as the Helen Peele. There had been a conflict of evidence as to what had taken place when the Helen Peele and the Edmund Harvey arrived, and as to what took place on the following morning when they were making fast to the Auguste Legembre. The conflict as to what did take place was very possibly due to the fact that the master of the Auguste Legembre was a Frenchman and spoke English only slightly. But it seemed to the court that what the master really meant on the evening of the 14th of December was that the question of towage should be settled on the following morning, and when the morning came The Edmund Harvey was made fast to The Auguste Legembre because she could not remain astern of the tug while the tug was towing the steamer. But the court thought that the lifeboat men were entitled to be considered in the salvage award on account of the peculiar circumstances under which they had to render their services. The tug, it was said, would not be allowed to go out without the lifeboat, and was built for that express service, the rule being that she had to tow the lifeboat out. Practically, therefore, the lifeboat men had to keep with her, and she had to keep with the lifeboat. The court therefore thought that the lifeboat men ought to be treated as though they formed part of the crew of the tug, and were to be treated as instrumental in salving the property. With regard to The Dragon the question was one partly of law and partly of nautical skill. It was a legal question in the sense that although the tug's services were not directly accepted, but in fact were refused by the master of The Auguste Legembre, yet The Dragon did, at the request of The Victor, make fast ahead because the master of The Victor shouted through the megaphone to the master of The Auguste Legembre that he would not take him in tow without a third tug, and no intelligible answer appeared to have been received and accordingly she did in fact render a towage service of a valuable character. Now if those services were rendered in such circumstances that they ought to have been accepted then an award would be made of some amount on the well-known principle. The Elder Brethren had come to the conclusion that under the circumstances it was a reasonable thing for The Victor to take this third tug ahead, although in fact it did not turn out to be necessary, and The Dragon therefore ought not to be excluded, although the award should be of a moderate character. The award, therefore, would be £500 to The Victor, £325 to The Helen Peele's men, £100 to The Dragon, £75 to the lifeboat men.

LEIGH AND OTHERS v. TAYLOR AND OTHERS. (a.)

Fixtures—Tenant for life and remainderman—Tapestry—Attachment to the structure.

Valuable tapestries belonging to the tenant for life and by her fixed to the walls of the mansion-house, but removable without damage to the structure, do not become part of the freehold, but remain the property of the tenant for life.

Decision of the Court of Appeal (In re De Falbe, Ward v. Taylor, 49 W. R. 455, [1901] 1 Ch. 523) affirmed.

Appeal from the Court of Appeal (Rigby, Vaughan Williams, and Stirling, L.JJ., 49 W. R. 455, [1901] 1 Ch. 523). The question in dispute was between the executors of Madame de Falbe the tenant for life and the remainderman under her former husband's will as to the ownership of certain valuable tapestries.

Madame de Falbe being possessed of these tapestries, had affixed them to the walls of the drawing-room of the house of which she was tenant for life under the above-mentioned will. They were fixed in the following manner: Small slips of wood were fixed in the wood on the walls by means of nails and screws, and over these wooden strips canvas was stretched and nailed, and the tapestries were fastened to these strips and over the canvas by very small tacks, which did not penetrate the strips, white and gold mouldings were fixed round the strips of wood, and the whole formed part of the general decoration of the room. They had been removed with but very slight damage to the walls.

Byrne, J., came to the conclusion that they had been annexed to the mansion-house, and therefore passed with it to the persons interested in the settled estates. The Court of Appeal, however, held that the affixing was only for the better enjoyment of the tapestry, and consequently that the tenant for life was entitled.

Asquith, K.C., and Levett, K.C. (T. T. Methold with them), for the appellants.

Norton, K.C., and T. L. Wilkinson, for the respondents claiming under Madame de Falbe's will, were not heard.

H. B. Howard, for Madame de Falbe's executor.

Earl of HALSBURY, L.C.—In this case we have had a long and learned argument by the counsel who have appeared for the appellants. I am not certain that I quite understand the conflict between the two propositions, or that I quite understand on what principle one is supposed to decide these cases apart from the facts of each particular case.

One principle, I think, has been established from the earliest period of the law down to the present time—namely, that if something has been made part of the house it must necessarily go to the heir, because the house goes to the heir and it is part of the house. That seems logical enough. Another principle appears to be equally clear—namely, that where it is something which, although it may be attached in some form or another (I will say a word in a moment about the degree of attachment) to the walls of the house, yet, having regard to the nature of the thing itself, and the purpose of its being placed there, is not intended to form part of the realty, but is only a mode of enjoyment of the thing while the person is temporarily there, and is there for the purpose of his or her enjoyment, then it is removable and goes to the executor.

We have heard something about a suggested alteration of the law; but those two principles appear to have been established from the earliest times, and they are principles still in force. But the moment one comes to deal with the facts of each particular case, I quite agree that something has changed very much. I suspect that it is not the law or any principle of law, but it is a change in the mode of life, the degree in which certain things have seemed susceptible of being put up as mere ornament, whereas at an earlier period the ruder constructions rendered it impossible sometimes to sever the thing which was put up from the realty. If that is true, it is manifest that you can lay down no rule which will in itself solve the question; you must apply yourself to the facts of each particular case; and I am content here to apply myself to the facts of the case. Here are tapestries which, it is admitted, are worth a great deal of money. I put the case: Suppose this had been a tenant from year to year, and she put up these things, is it conceivable that a person would for the purpose of a tenancy from year to year put up these things exactly in this way if thereby they made a present of £7,000 to the landlord? Counsel for the appellants would not acquiesce in that; but in logic I am unable to sever the two sets of facts which I suggest. It is all very well to say that there is a difference between the cases of an heir and an executor on the one hand, and a landlord and a tenant on the other; but if you grant the proposition that it must depend upon the purpose of the annexation, and you must attend to the degree of the annexation, I am wholly unable to frame a hypothesis of a state of things in which these two principles will not decide the question whether you are dealing with a landlord and tenant, or whether you are dealing with a tenant for life and a remainderman, or with people standing in any other relation to these things in the way in which Madame de Falbe did as tenant for life to the remainderman.

We come, then, in my view, to the determination of the question upon the principles which I have pointed out, applying them to the particular facts of this case. What are they? Here we have objects of ornamentation of very great value. Undoubtedly their only function in life, if it may be so called, is the decoration of a room. Suppose the person had intended to remove them the next month or the next year or what not, I do not know, notwithstanding the ingenious effort that has been made by counsel for the appellants, in what other way they could have been fastened than that in which they were.

We have seen the hard matchboard to which they were fastened in the first instance; then canvas was stretched on it, and the decoration of the wall as it originally stood was perfectly preserved except to the extent to which the nails were driven into the wall; they were necessarily driven into the wall, because otherwise the tapestry could not have been stretched out firm, as it was. I do not know any other mode by which the large one, for example, fourteen feet long, could have been placed there as it was. One has immediately before one's mind's eyes cases of pictures of another sort; and after all, although this tapestry is very valuable, as I understand, and very beautiful, it is only a picture made in a particular form—it is a picture, whether woven or worked or what not, made for the purpose of ornamentation. When one looks at it and sees what it is, I should have thought, if ever there was an extreme case in which it would have been impossible to suppose that the person intended to dedicate it to the house, it was the case of these tapestries, which can be, and in fact have been, removed without anything but the most trifling disturbance of the material of the wall.

Under those circumstances I can entertain no doubt, now that we have had the whole case before us, that there is nothing which points to any intention to dedicate these tapestries to the house. There is nothing in the nature of the attachment which is necessarily permanent. A number of words have been used, such as "only very slightly attached," and "not permanently attached." They really often assume the very question in debate. I do not think that if anybody looked at the piece of boarding on which the canvas was stretched and on which this tapestry went—I can hardly imagine anything more slight as a matter of fact in this particular case than that attachment—he could entertain any doubt on the matter; I do not know how a piece of tapestry of that extent, fourteen feet long, stretched against a wall, could be more slightly attached than this was. Under those circumstances it appears to me that the thing is so easily susceptible of being removed (and it has in fact been removed, without any damage or material injury to the structure of the wall) that in my own mind, so far as it is dependent upon a question of fact in this case, I am of opinion that it never was intended to form part of the structure of this house; and that, after all, is what the meaning of "the benefit of the inheritance" comes to, though expressed in different words. It never was intended to remain a part of the house; the contrary is evident from the very nature of the attachment, the extent and degree of which was as slight as the nature of the thing attached would admit of. Therefore I come to the conclusion that this thing, put up for ornamentation and for the enjoyment of the person while occupying the house, is not under such circumstances as these part of the house. That is the problem one has to solve in each of these cases. If it is not part of the house, it falls under the rule now laid down for some centuries, that it is a sort of ornamental fixture, and can be removed by whoever has the right to the chattel—whose it was when it was originally put up.

For these reasons I am of opinion that this appeal must be dismissed with costs.

I only wish to say that I do not want to add to the confusion which it is suggested has been caused by differences of opinion among the learned judges below. My own view is that, going back for some centuries, the real differences of opinion, which apparently on the surface have been entertained by different judges, have not been at bottom differences in the law at all, but the facts have been regarded in different aspects according to the fashion of the times, the mode of ornamentation, and the mode in which houses were built, and the degree of attachment which from time to time became necessary or not according to the nature of the structure which was being dealt with. The principle appears to me to be the same to-day as it was in the early times; and the broad principle is that, unless it becomes part of the house in any intelligible sense, it is not a thing which passes to the heir. I am of opinion that this tapestry has not become part of the house, and was never intended in any way to become part of the house; and I am therefore of opinion that this appeal ought to be dismissed with costs, and I move your lordships accordingly.

Lord MACNAGHTEN.—I am quite of the same opinion.

It seems to me that the only question is, Have these tapestries become part of the freehold? I think these tapestries were purely matter of ornament, and not part of the freehold at all. Counsel for the appellants has spoken of the courts changing the law. I do not think that the law has been changed in the very least. It is said that in some cases it has been relaxed. I do not think it has been altered. What have altered are the habits and customs of the community. The increase of luxury has made many things matters of ornament which were not so used in former times. I think the only question is, Was this part of the freehold? and I do not think anybody can say it was so. I think the judgment in the Court of Appeal covers the whole ground.

Lord SHAND.—I am also of opinion that the decision of the Court of Appeal ought to be affirmed.

It may be true, as has been observed by the Lord Chancellor and by Lord Macnaghten, that there has been no change of the law; but I rather think that in the progress of time the law has been developed in the direction of holding what would at one time have been held to be parts of a building to be now temporary fixtures only, removable by the person who attached them to the building or his personal representative, and I think that this later view should be maintained.

It appears to me to be a sound principle, and to be the result of the later cases (whatever may have been the older law), that where a tenant for a term or a tenant for life has purchased tapestries or pictures and affixed them to the walls for the purposes of ornamentation, he is entitled to remove them, and his executor has the same right. That principle, as it seems to me, is decisive in this case.

There has been an attempt to show that there was here such a degree or character of annexation as to make these tapestries permanent additions to the house. I doubt whether there could have been such annexation by a tenant only as could have had this effect where the purpose of the annexation is ornamental. However firmly a tenant may put up such ornaments as pictures or tapestries upon the walls, I confess that I think he is entitled to remove them, if during his tenancy he desires to do so, in order, it may be, to substitute others in their place, or to take them away altogether; and the same would be true at the end of his tenancy, at least where they are not built in so as to be really parts of the permanent building. His position is that of a temporary occupant having put up things for temporary purposes. He will be bound to take care that no damage occurs to the walls which he does not put right; but that is a different matter from an obligation to leave chattels which have not been built in as additions to the house, and remain so when his tenancy ends.

Here, in fact, I think there was no permanent attachment, and I need not repeat what has been said by the Lord Chancellor as to the character of the attachments.

I entirely agree with the judgment of the Court of Appeal, and with the grounds upon which the learned judges unanimously proceeded in giving their judgment.

Lord BRAMPTON.—I am of the same opinion. I entirely agree with the exhaustive judgments in the Court of Appeal, and I agree also with all the observations which the Lord Chancellor has made with respect to this case.

I confess I see no difficulty about the case myself, and I cannot see in the least how it can be said that these tapestries could ever have formed a portion of the house. It is not as if they had been pictures painted upon the walls of the house as a fresco that could not have been removed. There I can thoroughly understand that it could not be removed, because you could not remove it without removing part of the wall itself—in which case you would probably destroy the fresco and injure the house. But there is no sense in which these tapestries can be said to have been part of the house, nor do I see how any structural injury to the house could really be caused by their removal.

Lord ROBERTSON.—I also concur. My view is completely represented by the judgment of Stirling, L.J.

Lord LINDLEY.—I am entirely of the same opinion. I cannot bring myself to believe that Madame de Falbe when she put up these tapestries made a present of £7,000 to the remainderman. The tapestry remained a chattel from first to last.

LEVI v. ANGLO-CONTINENTAL GOLD REEFS OF RHODESIA (LIMITED).

TAYLOR, Third Party. (a.)

Practice—Parties—Third party—Counterclaim—Plaintiff serving third-party notice—Jurisdiction—Ord. 16, r. 48.

Where a defendant in an action counterclaims against the plaintiff, the latter can serve a third-party notice, under ord. 16, r. 48, on a person against whom he claims contribution or indemnity in respect of the defendant's counterclaim.

Appeal from an order of Ridley, J., at chambers.

The action was brought to recover £100 for fees alleged to be due to the plaintiff as a director of the defendant company.

The defendants, in addition to a defence on the merits, counterclaimed for £437 10s., alleged to be due for calls upon 500 £1 shares in the defendant company standing in the plaintiff's name. The plaintiff thereupon served a third-party notice on one Taylor, under ord. 16, r. 48, upon the ground that Taylor had agreed to indemnify him against all liability for calls upon the shares. Taylor entered an appearance, and upon a summons for directions the master held that a plaintiff against whom a counterclaim was delivered had no power to serve a third-party notice claiming indemnity in respect thereof, and he refused to give directions.

Ridley, J., on appeal, held that there was jurisdiction in such a case to serve a third-party notice, and he reversed the order of the master.

The third party appealed.

Llewelyn Davies and Denis O'Conor, for the third party.—Ord. 16, rr. 48-55, which authorize and regulate third-party procedure, only allow a defendant in the strict sense of the term to bring in a third party. Those rules speak of plaintiff and defendant, and "plaintiff" is defined by section 100 of the Judicature Act, 1873, as including "every person asking any relief (otherwise than by way of counterclaim as a defendant)." Therefore a defendant who counterclaims is not a "plaintiff" within the meaning of the rules. It follows that a plaintiff, against whom a counterclaim is delivered, cannot be a "defendant" within the meaning of ord. 16, r. 48. The procedure laid down by the rules is not applicable to a plaintiff against whom the defendant counterclaims. [They referred to Gibbs & Co. v. Neville & Co., 48 W. R. 532, [1900] 2 Q B. 181; Eyre v. Moreing. [1884] W. N. 58.] Secondly, if there was jurisdiction, the court ought not in the exercise of its discretion to allow the third party to be brought in. If the plaintiff succeeds on the claim and the defendants succeed on the counterclaim, the result will be that the defendants will recover judgment against the plaintiff for the difference between £437 10s. and £100—viz., £337 10s., and the third party can only be made liable to pay that sum to the plaintiff. Another action would have to be brought to recover the balance of £100. There is, therefore, no advantage in complicating the case by allowing the claim against the third party to be litigated in this action.

C. H. Swanton, for the plaintiff, was not called upon.

(a.) Reported by W. F. BARRY, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

MATHEW, L.J.—In my opinion, this appeal must be dismissed. The first question raised is a question of jurisdiction. It is contended that, though a defendant has been given by the rules the right to counterclaim against the plaintiff, the latter, against whom the counterclaim is delivered, is debarred from bringing in a third party from whom he claims contribution or indemnity in respect of the defendant's claim. I can see no reason why a plaintiff, who has been made a defendant to a counterclaim, should be embarrassed in this way. Counterclaims were established for the purpose of disposing in one action of all disputes between the parties. A counterclaim is treated throughout the rules as in effect a cross-action. Ord. 21, r. 11, which is an important rule giving a defendant a right to set up a counterclaim raising questions between himself and the plaintiff along with other persons, directs him to add to the title of his defence a further title similar to the title in a statement of claim, setting forth the names of all the persons who, if such counterclaim were to be enforced by cross-action, would be defendants to such cross-action. That rule contemplates a counterclaim as being similar to a cross-action. Further, Lord Esher, M.R., in Stumore v. Campbell & Co., 40 W. R. 101, [1892] 1 Q. B. 314; and Bowen, L.J., in Amon v. Bobbett, 37 W. R. 329, 22 Q. B. D. 543, were of opinion that a counterclaim should be treated as an independent action. For myself, I can see no difficulty in allowing a plaintiff to bring in a third party to a counterclaim by the defendant. It is said that it has never been done. I quite agree that no authority has been cited to us in which the question has been even discussed. I can hardly doubt, however, that the question must have arisen in some case before this, and probably it has not occurred to anyone to take the point that a plaintiff, against whom a counterclaim has been launched, cannot bring in a third party from whom he claims contribution or indemnity. I am therefore of opinion that there is jurisdiction to allow the third party to be served with notice. There remains the question of discretion. I can quite see that the master might in a particular case consider it so embarrassing to the plaintiff, whether he be the plaintiff in the action or the defendant making a counterclaim, to allow the other party against whom the claim is brought to bring in a third party and to have the rights as between these two latter parties litigated in the action, that he would refuse in the exercise of his discretion to sanction it. In the present case I see no reason why all the questions raised should not be decided in this action. It is said that the possible effect may be that the judge at the trial will only be able to give judgment against the third party for £337, and that therefore the claim against the third party will have to be split up and a second action brought against him to recover the £100. However that may be technically, it would be met, as was pointed out by Cozens-Hardy, L.J., during the argument, by the declaration in the judgment that the defendants were entitled to recover £437 on their counterclaim against the plaintiff, if that sum were found to be due, and the third party would be bound by that declaration. The suggested difficulty upon that ground therefore came to nothing. In my opinion the order of the learned judge was right, and the appeal must be dismissed.

COZENS-HARDY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. I need not stay to consider whether a counterclaim is for all purposes a cross-action, because the present case, in my opinion, clearly comes within ord. 16, r. 48. The defendants delivered a counterclaim against the plaintiff claiming a large sum for calls. So far as that counterclaim is concerned the defendants are the actors in it and are therefore in the position of plaintiffs in regard to it. The plaintiff alleges that he holds an indemnity from Taylor against a liability for those calls, and he has accordingly served him with a third-party notice. I cannot imagine a case more within the words and spirit of the rule, nor can I imagine one more fitting for the exercise of the discretion in favour of allowing the third party to be brought in.

Appeal dismissed.

The plaintiff, a wholesale jeweller, entered into a contract with the defendant, a jobmaster, for the hire of a brougham and driver for the use of the plaintiff's traveller, and the brougham was fitted up for the purpose of such use. The traveller having gone into an hotel to get his lunch leaving the brougham in the street, the driver also went away for a similar purpose, and in their absence a quantity of the plaintiff's jewellery was stolen from the brougham. In an action to recover the value of the jewellery, Judgment of Ridley, J. (49 W. R. 653), reversed.

Appeal from the judgment of Ridley, J., at the trial of an action without a jury, reported 49 W. R. 653.

The action was brought by a manufacturer of jewellery against a jobmaster to recover £460, an agreed sum, as the value of certain articles of jewellery lost owing to the alleged negligence of the defendant's servant.

On the 21st of June, 1898, the defendant wrote a letter to the plaintiff to the following effect: "I shall be pleased to supply you with same brougham as you are having at £3 for the five days' week, payable monthly. Holidays or days it is not required to be allowed for. You can choose the brougham yourself, and I will keep the same coachman (Shed), paying him 18s. weekly for five days, and will try and give him work the other two days with extra pay."

On the 28th of June the plaintiff's traveller, on behalf of the plaintiff, wrote to the defendant as follows: "In accordance with your favour of the 21st inst., please start the brougham on Monday next." This letter also stated that the plaintiff had seen a brougham at Messrs. Alford's which he would like to have fitted up for the purpose of taking out goods. The brougham in question was fitted up, and was regularly used by the plaintiff's traveller. After some time Shed ceased to drive the brougham and his place was taken by a man named Mills, who continued to drive down to the 24th of October, 1900. On that day the traveller in the course of his rounds left the brougham outside the Thomas à Becket Hotel, in the Old Kent-road, and went into the hotel to get his lunch, locking the door and taking the key with him. The driver also left the brougham standing outside the hotel, and went into the adjoining premises to get his dinner. While he was at dinner the brougham was driven away, and the contents—viz., the articles of jewellery the value of which was sought to be recovered in the action—were stolen.

There was a conflict of evidence on two questions—first, whether the defendant had, before the letter of the 21st of June, stipulated that he would not take any responsibility; and, secondly, whether the plaintiff's traveller knew that the driver was in the habit of leaving the brougham unattended when he went to get his dinner.

Ridley, J., was of opinion that, although the loss was due to the negligence of the driver in leaving the brougham unattended, yet, inasmuch as under the contract the defendant did not accept the duty of taking care of the goods, he was not liable for the loss. He accordingly gave judgment for the defendant.

The plaintiff appealed.

COLLINS, M.R.—I think that this appeal must be allowed. The facts of the case appear to me to be simple. The plaintiff is a manufacturer of jewellery, and the defendant is a jobmaster, and a contract was entered into between them for the hire of a brougham. The terms of the contract are contained in a letter from the defendant to the plaintiff dated the 21st of June and a letter in answer dated the 28th of June. From those letters it appears that the intention of the parties was that a particular brougham was to be supplied by the defendant for the purpose of being used by the plaintiff's traveller, and that the defendant should also provide a driver. It seems to me to be clear that the contract was made with reference to well-known circumstances, and that structural alterations were to be made in the brougham for the purpose of fitting it up in such a manner as would render it more suitable for being used in a well-understood way. I think there was an obligation on the defendant to furnish a brougham chosen by the plaintiff himself which should be reasonably fit for the purpose of being used in that well-understood way, and to see that it was properly fitted up and adapted for the work of the person who was to use it, and a further obligation to furnish a driver who should use ordinary care in driving the brougham, and in whose custody the brougham should remain. It must be taken that the defendant knew that the plaintiff's traveller would not be in the brougham during the whole of his rounds, but would necessarily have to leave it at intervals, and I think that by inference an obligation was cast on the defendant to see that the brougham was taken care of during the intervals when the traveller would be obliged to leave it. Ridley, J., however, held that the relation between the parties did not involve any right in the plaintiff to ordinary care on the part of the driver to guard the contents of the brougham. I cannot agree with that; I think there was an obligation on the defendant to supply a driver who should use ordinary care both in driving the brougham and in safeguarding its contents during the intervals I have mentioned. There seems to me to be no ground for suggesting that the traveller was the only person who was responsible to the plaintiff for the safety of the jewellery, and I cannot agree with the learned judge in thinking that the legal position of the traveller negatived any liability on the part of the driver's master. It was argued that the loss was to be attributed to contributory negligence on the part of the traveller, and in support of this it was said that the traveller had often seen the driver leave the brougham and had allowed him to do so. But the learned judge in his judgment negatived this; for he said that, though the traveller did not know that the driver was in the habit of leaving the brougham unattended, he ought to have known it. The case comes back to this, whether there was a contract involving an obligation on the defendant to provide a driver who should use ordinary care in safeguarding the contents of the brougham during the traveller's absence. I am of opinion that there was, and it is clear that that obligation has not been performed. With regard to the contention that a new element has been introduced—viz., the theft—which makes a break in the chain of causality, I think that the loss in this case was a direct consequence of one of the things which must be taken to have been contemplated by the parties—viz., the failure of the obligation to prevent intrusion.

The appeal must therefore be allowed, and judgment must be entered for the plaintiff.

Abel Thomas, K.C., and *W. D. That coal could not have been worked out in less than from three and a-half to five years. Subsequent knowledge acquired at the time of the arbitration may be taken as confirming and crystallizing the evidence as to the probable rise in price.

They referred to Haynes v. Haynes, 9 W. R. 497, 30 L. J. Ch. 578.

Vaughan Williams, L.J.—The question we have to decide is whether the arbitrator in assessing the compensation should take in consideration the rise in the market price of coal between the dates of the notice to treat and the assessment of the compensation. The way in which the arbitrator himself expresses the contention of the coal company is set out in a paragraph in the special case as follows: "During the said reference the coal company claimed that in consequence of such rise the compensation to be paid by the waterworks company should be assessed, not on the basis of the knowledge of the value of the said part of the said mines, veins, beds, and seams which was possessed at the date of the said notice of the 15th of October, 1898 (which basis is hereinafter called the first alternative), but on the basis of the knowledge of such value which was subsequently acquired (which lastly mentioned basis is hereinafter called the second alternative)." The case then goes on to say that the question for the opinion of the court is whether the coal company are entitled to have compensation assessed according to the first alternative or according to the second alternative. The particular case in which the compensation has to be determined is set forth in the special case, and it appears from that the waterworks company did not give notice to the coal company that they would actually purchase the coal, but they gave notice that they were willing to make compensation to the coal company for their estate and interest in that part of the mines, veins, beds, and seams of coal which they required the coal company to leave unworked. Under that notice I have no doubt that the measure of compensation would be the same as if there was a notice to purchase the coal. If the coal was purchased the measure of compensation would be the same as on an expulsion from the land. If the coal company are debarred from working the coal, the measure of damages is the same as if the coal were purchased. That being so, it is common ground here that the measure of compensation must be ascertained as of the date of the notice to treat—that is to say, the value of the coal must be taken as on that date. The contention of the coal company is that, though the value of the coal must be taken as of the date of the notice to treat, the arbitrator was entitled, in estimating that value, to take into consideration the subsequent rise in price. The price of coal may rise or fall according to contingencies which no one can foretell. The arbitrator must admittedly ascertain the present value of the coal, and yet it is said that in arriving at that value he is to take into account the contingency of the future rise or fall in price, of which no one can form an estimate. It is argued that because the contingency happened at the time when the compensation came to be assessed, the arbitrator must deal with it as a matter to be taken into account in arriving at the value of the coal at the date of the notice to treat. I am unable to agree with that contention. In arriving at the present value of the coal the arbitrator can only take into consideration that which could have been anticipated as possible at the time when the notice to treat was given and which admitted of a measure of compensation at that time. It seems to me, therefore, that the true rule is that, in assessing compensation, the arbitrator can take into consideration every circumstance which existed in fact at the date of the notice to treat, as well as the probable user of the property in respect of which compensation is payable. For instance, if the property is agricultural land, its adaptability for building purposes should be taken into consideration, because that is a fact in existence at the date of the notice to treat. If, again, after the notice to treat has been served it is discovered that the land has some inherent value which nobody expected or knew of at the date of the notice to treat, that would be a proper circumstance to take into consideration in assessing the value of the property, because it would be a fact affecting the property at the date of the notice to treat. But when one deals with contingencies arising afterwards which cannot be assessed, such contingencies ought not to be taken into account. This is really the basis of the rule in giving damages for breach of contract. There may, and indeed must, be taken into consideration the value of the thing at the date when the contract ought to be performed, but not matters which are so remote or uncertain as not to be capable of measurement. The fact that before the compensation is assessed one of those contingencies has actually happened cannot be taken into consideration as enhancing the value of the property to be acquired. In my opinion the decision of the Divisional Court was wrong, and cannot be supported. The answer to the question put by the umpire in the special case should be that the compensation ought to have been assessed according to the first alternative—that is to say, according to the facts as they existed at the time of the notice to treat, and on that basis the compensation amounts to £2,950.

Romer, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. I gather that it is common ground that the compensation is to be assessed upon the value of the coal on the 15th of October, 1898, when the notice to treat was given. I agree that in ascertaining what the true value of the coal was at that date, the arbitrator might look at the subsequent facts so far as they are material to show the value of the coal upon that date. A circumstance occurring subsequently to the 15th of October, 1898, is, as stated in the case, that "coal rose in value subsequently to the date of the notice of the 15th of October, 1898." The next paragraph in the case states clearly the circumstance which the coal company claimed should be taken into consideration. The coal company claimed that in consequence of such rise the compensation paid by the waterworks company should be assessed, not on the basis of the knowledge of the value of the coal which was possessed at the date of the notice to treat, but on the basis of the knowledge of such value which was subsequently acquired. Therefore we have it that the only circumstance arising since the 15th of October, 1898, and relied upon as showing the true value of the coal, is the general rise in the price of coal since that date. That clearly means a rise in the price of coal as a general commercial article, and it is said that the arbitrator is to assess the value of this particular coal on the 15th of October, from his knowledge of the higher value of coal since that date.

In my opinion that contention is not tenable. The rise in the value of coal might be due to circumstances which were not in existence when the notice to treat was given, and which could not have then been foreseen. It would be wrong to say that the mere subsequent rise in the price of coal showed that the value of coal on the 15th of October was not its true value at that time. It is said that in estimating the value of coal on that date, expert evidence might have been called as to the prospective rise or fall in the price of coal as on that date. Admitting that to be so for the purposes of this case, any such opinion must be based upon facts existing at the time. It would not do for an expert to say that he could give no reasons for his opinion, that he could point to no facts to justify it, but that he was stating his opinion as a matter of mere speculation. It seems to me that in such a case the evidence would not be receivable. Expert evidence is only admissible because there are facts in existence the natural conclusions from which are not apparent except to the mind of an expert; but the opinions of experts must be founded on facts. When the market value of coal on the 15th of October was ascertained, that was its true value, subject to the then existing circumstances likely to cause it to rise or fall in price. But to say that because there was a subsequent rise in the price of coal the arbitrator must disregard the value of coal on the 15th of October is to me an untenable proposition. The appeal must therefore be allowed.

Practice — Costs — Taxation — "Disbursement" — Money paid to "Security for costs account" — Solicitors Act, 1843 (6 & 7 Vict. c. 73), s. 37.

Moneys paid by solicitors in conducting an action to the "Security for costs account" for discovery and interrogatories are "disbursements" within the meaning of the Solicitors Act, 1843, and are properly entered as such in a bill of costs.

In re Remnant, 11 Beav. 603, explained and followed.

Summons to review taxation.

In a taxation as between solicitor and client the taxing-master had disallowed items of £5 and £8 respectively paid by the solicitors to the "Security for costs account" under ord. 31, rr. 25, 26, and 27, upon application for discovery and interrogatories. Objection having been taken to the disallowance, the taxing-master gave as his reason in each case: "This deposit cannot be allowed as the solicitors can obtain the return of it; the costs of doing this are subsequently allowed."

The bill was a heavy one, and if these items were disallowed, the effect was that more than one-sixth of the bill was taxed off. The solicitors took out this summons to review the taxation.

E. E. Humphreys, for the solicitors, relied on In re Remnant, 11 Beav. 603.

E. W. Hansell, for the client.—These are not payments which the solicitors were under any liability to make, and cannot therefore be "disbursements"; they ought to appear, not in a bill of costs, but in a separate cash account: In re Kingdon & Wilson, ante, p. 533, 18 Times L. R. 588.

KEKEWICH, J., in giving judgment, remarked that as a general rule he felt the greatest hesitation in differing from a taxing-master, who was accustomed to deal with bills of costs every day, and was cognizant of the practice in such matters; in the present case, however, the taxing-master had given a reason for disallowing the items without making any statement as to the practice usual with regard to such items; that reason, in his lordship's opinion, was not a good one, and no other reason was given; in his opinion these payments were—in a proper case—as necessary for a solicitor to make as were payments for counsel's fees, stamps on office copies, and the like. The proper criterion was not whether, in a certain event, the money could be returned, but in what character the solicitor made the payment—was it as solicitor in his professional duty, or was it merely as agent? As general agent a solicitor frequently did acts generous even to folly, and payments made in that way could not be brought into a bill of costs; the agency in such cases arose by virtue of the professional relation, not by virtue of the professional character, and payments so made should go into a separate cash account; but if he acted as a solicitor, payments made by him in the prudent course of his business were as much "disbursements" as were counsel's fees and stamps; that appeared to his lordship to be the proper criterion, and the one which was adopted by Langdale, M.R., in In re Remnant. To hold with the taxing-master would be extremely inconvenient; if a solicitor was not liable to pay as solicitor it would mean that whenever an affidavit of documents was applied for there would be a long delay owing to his non-liability to make the payments requisite for the purpose. The bill must go back to the taxing-master with that expression of his lordship's opinion.

Bill sent down for revision; leave to appeal.

Company — Reduction of capital — Unequal payments upon ordinary shares — Losses to be borne proportionately.

The deferred shares in a company were paid up in full, the ordinary shares of £10 each were as to some paid up to £5 each, as to others up to £2. The articles of association of the company provided that in the case of a winding up the losses were to be borne by the members in proportion to the capital paid up. The company passed a special resolution that the ordinary shares be reduced from £10 to £8 10s., cancelling capital to the extent of £1 10s. on each ordinary share.

Held, that the same rule must be followed in the reduction of capital as would have been followed in a winding up, and that the losses must be borne by the members in proportion to the capital paid up on the shares.

Petition.

This was a petition for confirmation by the court of the reduction of capital.

The Credit Assurance and Guarantee Corporation (Limited) had a capital of £1,000,000, divided into 2,000 deferred shares of £1 each, and 99,800 ordinary shares of £10 each.

The deferred shares were all issued and fully paid, and 37,712 ordinary shares had been issued. Of the latter 2,621 had been forfeited, 1,123 had been issued under a duly registered contract with £5 paid up, and the remainder had been paid up to the extent of £2.

The memorandum of association provided that the profits should be applied after allowing for a reserve fund in paying first a dividend of 10 per cent. on the amount paid up for the time being, one half of the surplus to the holders of deferred shares, and the remaining moiety, subject to the payment thereout of such extra remuneration to the directors as might be determined in general meeting, should belong to the holders of ordinary shares.

By article 152 of the articles of association: "If the corporation shall be wound up, and the surplus assets shall be insufficient to repay the whole of the paid-up capital, such surplus assets shall be distributed so that, as nearly as may be, the losses shall be borne by the members in proportion to the capital paid up, or which ought to have been paid up, on the shares held by them respectively at the commencement of the winding up. But this clause is to be without prejudice to the rights of the holders of shares issued upon special conditions."

The corporation had power to reduce its capital by paying off capital or cancelling capital which had been lost or was unrepresented by available assets.

On the 12th of December, 1901, a special resolution was passed reducing the capital to £850,300, divided into 99,800 shares of £10 each, and 2,000 deferred shares of £1 each, and such reduction was to be effected by cancelling capital to the extent of £1 10s. in respect of each of the ordinary shares, which had been issued and were then outstanding, and by reducing the nominal amount of all the ordinary shares in the company's capital from £10 to £8 10s.

Upjohn, K.C., and W. A. G. Woods, for the company.—The reduction on the deferred shares, if carried out, would be trivial, and the shareholders have power to vary the general rule that all classes of shares should be reduced equally: British and American Trustee and Finance Corporation v. Couper, 42 W. R. 652, [1894] A. C. 399. Article 152 is to take effect only in case of a winding up. It was a mere bargain between the shareholders which they could alter: Bannatyne v. Direct Spanish Telegraph Co., 35 W. R. 125, 34 Ch. D. 287.

Jenkins, K.C., and Martelli, for opposing shareholders.—Some of the ordinary shareholders had paid up more than others, and the reduction ought to be borne in the same proportion as losses in a winding up.

Farwell, J., said that with regard to the objection that there was to be no reduction in respect of the deferred shares, inasmuch as the moiety of profits after 10 per cent. had been paid on the ordinary shares was to go to them it did not much matter, so far as dividend was concerned, how much was deemed to be paid up. With regard to the return of capital on a winding up, the sum concerned was so small that he thought he might disregard it altogether.

However, the case was different as regards the ordinary shares, and he felt constrained to allow the objection, though he did it with some reluctance.

The ordinary rule, in the absence of special provision, was that the assets available for distribution in the winding up were to be distributed amongst the members in proportion to the nominal amount of capital held by them. In order to avoid that a special provision had been inserted in the articles. It was the practice of the court in cases of reduction of capital to act upon the principle that the reduction was a sort of anticipation of what would take place in the event of a winding up: Bannatyne v. Direct Spanish Telegraph Co. He looked, therefore, at the articles to see what the bargain was in the present case, and he could not see how he could avoid giving effect to it.

The petition must be dismissed.

Building society—Cancellation of registry—Winding up—Building Societies Act, 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. c. 47), s. 6, sub-sections 1, 5; s. 8.

Where the registration of a building society has been cancelled, and it has ceased to carry on business, a creditor's remedy is to petition for a winding-up order.

In such a case the court may direct that no proceedings be taken under the order without leave beyond the transfer of assets to the official receiver.

Petition for a winding-up order.

The society was registered in 1878 under the Building Societies Act, 1874, with a nominal capital of £175,000 and a paid-up capital of about £82. The society carried on no business after 1880 and in 1895 its registration was cancelled under the Building Societies Act, 1894, s. 6, sub-section 5. Prior to 1880 the society had become indebted to the petitioner to the amount of about £31; it was stated by the petition that the society was insolvent and that its sole asset was a sum of £73 and interest in the hands of its bankers.

P. Rose-Innes, for the petitioner.

Buckley, J., said that by section 6, sub-section 5, of the Act of 1894, after cancellation of its registration the society absolutely ceased to enjoy as such the privileges of a building society, but without prejudice to any liability actually incurred and the enforcing of such liability, and by section 8, sub-section 1, the society was to be deemed a company within the meaning of the Companies (Winding-up) Act, 1890. This petition was filed to enforce a liability and to obtain payment out for the benefit of the creditors of the money in the bank. In In re Anglo-American Exploration and Development Co., [1898] 1 Ch. 100, 46 W. R. Dig. 31, it was held that where the name of a company had been struck off the register under the Companies Acts a creditor's remedy was to petition for a winding-up order; and in this case he would make a winding-up order and thereby enable the official receiver to get the money from the bank, but no proceeding beyond that was to be taken under the winding-up order without the leave of the court.

Metropolis—Rating—Poor rate—Valuation list—Omission to give notice of increase of valuation—Refusal to pay increased rate—Application for distress warrant—Objection to issue of warrant—Appeal against valuation list—Valuation (Metropolis) Act, 1869 (32 & 33 Vict. c. 67), ss. 9, 45.

Where the overseers of a parish raise the gross or rateable value of a hereditament, and no notice of such alteration, as required by section 9 of the Valuation (Metropolis) Act, 1869, has been served upon the occupier of the hereditament, the occupier cannot, on the application for a distress warrant to recover the balance of the rate, raise the objection that no such notice had been served upon him, that objection being one that could only be raised by an appeal against the valuation list or against the rate.

Case stated by Horace Smith, Esq., Metropolitan police magistrate, sitting at Westminster police-court.

A complaint was made by the mayor, aldermen, and councillors of the City of Westminster, the appellants, that the Army and Navy Auxiliary Co-operative Supply (Limited), the respondents, being duly rated and assessed in the parish of St. Margaret and St. John, in the City of Westminster, had not paid the sum of £8 7s. 9d., which had been duly demanded of them. The magistrate, after hearing the parties and the evidence adduced by them on the 11th and the 18th of December, 1901, on the 9th of February, 1902, refused to issue a distress warrant and dismissed the summons.

The facts as stated were as follows: The respondents were at all times material to this case the occupiers of certain premises known as 20 and 22, Caxton-street, in the parish of St. Margaret and St. John, in the City of Westminster.

On the 12th of April, 1901, a general rate was made and published by the appellants, acting as the overseers of the parish under and by virtue of the London Government Act, 1899. In this rate the respondents were assessed in respect of the said premises at the sum of £33 2s. 9d., being at the rate of 2s. 9d. in the pound upon a rateable value of £241, being the rateable value of the premises as stated in the quinquennial valuation list for the parish made in the year 1900 under the Valuation (Metropolis) Act, 1869.

The sum of £33 2s. 9d. was demanded of the respondents, and they paid to the appellants the sum of £24 15s., the amount due on the assessment entered in the quinquennial valuation list for the parish made in 1895, leaving a balance of £8 7s. 9d. unpaid, which the respondents contended they were not liable to pay for the reasons hereinafter appearing.

The appellants took out a summons to recover the above sum of £8 7s. 9d., and upon the hearing of the summons the rate was produced and it was proved that this sum had been demanded and that the respondents were in occupation of the said premises.

The respondents proved that no notice of an alteration in value in accordance with section 9 of the Valuation (Metropolis) Act, 1869, had been served on them by the appellants, and it was admitted by the appellants' witness, who was called in support of the summons, that no such notice had been given to the respondents, and that the respondents had no notice of the raising of the gross and rateable values of the premises until the 12th of April, 1901.

The respondents contended that they were not liable to pay the sum of £8 7s. 9d., being the balance of the sum charged upon them by the above rate, upon the ground that the rate was based upon the rateable value of the premises stated in the quinquennial valuation list made in 1900—namely, £241, being an increase of £61 over the rateable value stated in the valuation list made in 1895—namely, £180, and they contended that the entry in the quinquennial valuation list made in 1900 relating to the premises was not binding upon them, because no notice, as it was admitted, of the increase in the rateable value of the premises had been given to them by the overseers of the parish, as required by section 9 (1) of the Valuation (Metropolis) Act, 1869, and therefore the quinquennial valuation list of 1900 was not the list for the time being in force, nor was it duly made in accordance with the Act, and therefore that they, the respondents, were not liable to pay so much of the rate as was charged upon the increase in the rateable value as shown by the quinquennial valuation list made in 1900 over the rateable value appearing in the valuation list made in 1895, and that as they had paid so much of the said rate—namely, the sum of £24 15s., as was charged upon the rateable value stated in the valuation list made in 1895, they were not liable to pay the further sum of £8 7s. 9d., which was charged upon the increase in the rateable value of the premises as shown by the list made in 1900. They cited in support of these contentions the case of Reg. v. Justices of Middlesex, 20 W. R. 774, L. R. 7 Q. B. 653.

The appellants contended that they were entitled to a distress warrant to recover the above sum of £8 7s. 9d. on the following grounds—namely, (1) that inasmuch as the respondents had not appealed against the rate, or the list on which it was based, the respondents were not entitled on the hearing of the summons to dispute the validity of the valuation list, and that the rate being good on the face of it and the respondents being admittedly in occupation of the premises for which they were rated, the duty of the magistrate was merely ministerial and that the appellants were not bound to show that the notice required by section 9 (1) of the Valuation (Metropolis) Act, 1869, had been duly given; and (2) that even if no such notice as is directed by the section had been given, the valuation list was not thereby rendered invalid.

The magistrate decided that the appellants' contentions upon both grounds were wrong, and that he ought not to issue a distress warrant to recover the sum of £8 7s. 9d.

The question for the opinion of the court was whether the magistrate was right in so deciding.

By the Valuation (Metropolis) Act, 1869 (32 & 33 Vict. c. 67), it is provided as follows:

Section 9: "In each of the following cases—namely, . . . where the assessment committee . . . alter a valuation list . . . by raising the gross or rateable value from a hereditament comprised therein, the overseers shall immediately after the deposit or re-deposit of the list (as the case may be) serve on the occupier of such hereditament a notice of the gross and rateable value thereof inserted in the valuation list."

Section 45: 'The valuation list for the time being in force shall be deemed to have been duly made in accordance with this Act and the Acts incorporated herewith, and shall for all or any of the purposes in mentioned be conclusive evidence of the and of the rateable value of the several ...ments included therein . . ."

Marshall, K.C. (Ryde with him), for the appellants.—The magistrate had no jurisdiction to refuse the warrant. The rate was in order and the fact that notice had not been served in accordance with section 9 did not affect its validity. Section 9 is purely directory and not imperative: Reg. v. Ingall, 25 W. R. 57. 2 Q. B. D. 199; Reg. v. Justices of London [1893] 2 Q. B. 476. The respondents should either have appealed against the valuation list or have applied to the court for a mandamus: Bates v. Plumstead Overseers 64 L. J. M. C. 127. 43 W. R. Dig. 117; Churchwardens of Birmingham v. Shaw. 10 Q. B. 868; Bavin v. Hutchinson, 10 W. R 807, 31 L. J. M. C. 229.

Bray, K.C. (E. Hilliard with him), for the respondents.—If the valuation list is in force against the respondents they have no remedy, as they would be bound by section 45 of the Act of 1869, and an injustice would be thus inflicted upon them. The object, however, of the Act is to arrive at an equitable assessment, and the expression "valuation list" in section 45 must mean a valuation list in respect of which all the formalities prescribed by the Act have been duly performed, and it is, therefore, essential that a notice of alteration of valuation should be served upon the occupier: Reg. v. Justices of London. Section 65 of the Act is in favour of the respondents. If the valuation list is not in force as against the respondents the overseers have no power to make this rate. Blackburn, J., in the case of Reg. v. Justices of Middlesex, 20 W. R. 774, L. R. 7 Q. B 653, at p. 656, says: "Whether or not the valuation is binding on persons who have had no notice under section 9 we are not called upon to decide, and I express no opinion, though it would seem but just that it should not affect them."

He also cited Reg. v. Justices of Kingston, 6 W. R. 551, E. B. & E. 256.

Ryde, in reply.—Notice of an alteration is not essential, and a defect under section 45 is not fatal. Further, the respondents might have appealed against the valuation list under sections 11 and 32 of the Act, and on discovering that no notice had been served, and if out of time, they might have applied to this court for a mandamus to the assessment committee to hear their objections. Reg. v. Rochester Corporation, 7 Ell. & B. 910, 6 W. R. C. L. Dig. 67. The object of the Legislature was to prevent any mere defect in service of notice from invalidating the valuation list, and the object of section 45 was to cure all defects in the preliminary steps.

Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J.—This is one of those troublesome cases which not infrequently arise under this class of Act of Parliament where the difficulty is to trace out what is the effect of a particular omission of some apparent condition precedent. In the view I take in this case it is not necessary for us to decide, any more than it was for Blackburn and Lush, JJ., to decide in the case of Reg. v. Justices of Middlesex what is the actual effect of the omission to serve the notice under section 9. Personally I incline to the view that for the purpose of making a rate the omission is cured by section 45, because, if not, nobody could safely make a rate without ascertaining that all the notices had been given. But I think that the decision of this case really depends upon other considerations. Mr. Bray says that because no notice was given under section 9 the valuation list for the time being in force cannot be deemed to have been duly made. If that were so section 45 would have very little effect. Section 45 could scarcely mean that a valuation list, as to which all conditions have been fulfilled, shall be deemed to be in force. I think it probably has reference to the earlier section—43. That would not be conclusive against Mr. Bray, because he would be entitled to say that though it might save some conditions it did not save this particular one, which was the personal notice under section 9. But it seems to me that Mr. Bray is in this difficulty. The application to the magistrate was for the issue of a distress warrant. If the overseers were justified in acting upon the valuation list of 1900 and making a rate, then Mr. Bray has to show that the point he raises is a point that he is entitled to raise in objection to the distress warrant being issued. Now I think that a person is not entitled to raise, in answer to an application for a distress warrant, all the points which he could possibly raise upon appeal. I quite agree that there are points which he can raise on both proceedings, as, for instance, non-occupation; but still I do not think that because a matter may be raised on appeal it can also be raised in answer to an objection to issue a distress warrant. I think, to a certain extent, that principle was recognized in the case of The Churchwardens of Birmingham v. Shaw, in which it was held "that a person exempt from poor rate, as the occupier of premises belonging to a scientific or literary society, must, if assessed for such premises, contest the liability by appeal, and cannot bring an action for a levy made to enforce such rate, not appealed against." I think that was practically repeated by my brother Wills in the case of Bates v. Plumstead Overseers, 64 L. J. M. C. 127, in which he said, at p. 129: "The only objections, therefore, which can be entertained by a magistrate on an application for a distress warrant are the three following: that the property rated is not in the parish; that the party rated is not the occupier; and that the rate is, on the face of it, bad." I do not wish to be thought to say that those three are the only objections, but I think they point to the class of objections that can be raised.

Lastly, in The Overseers of Manchester v. Headlam, 21 Q. B. D. 96, 36 W. R. Dig. 149, Wills, J., again pointed out in a considered judgment of the court how all these cases went back to the authority of Crease v. Sawle, 2 Q. B. 862, which decided that the rate being good on the face of it could not be impugned in an action for trespass for levying distress in respect of the rate. He said: "The objection being matter of appeal the rate unappealed against ought to be enforced. It would be very unfortunate if it should be otherwise, and if by reason of an error, possibly of the most trifling kind, made by the overseers in the amount of property which they supposed to be in the occupation of a particular individual, he, after having forborne to avail himself of an ample and satisfactory remedy for any error to his prejudice in the rate, could evade payment of the poor rate altogether. One cannot conceive a greater encouragement to improper litigation."

I think that those cases do lay down the substantial rules which show the class of points which can be raised in answering an application for a distress warrant, and that primâ facie points which may be raised on appeal ought not to be raised then. With reference to the opinion of Blackburn, J., which was cited from the case of Reg. v. Justices of Middlesex, I am by no means sure the learned judge was not referring to the question of whether or not the valuation should be conclusive upon an appeal. I do not think he had in his mind at that time the question of the issue of a distress warrant. Now had the respondents the right of appeal? I think they had. I am not so clear in my own mind that they had the right to apply for a mandamus. I admit that there is a close analogy with those cases where a mandamus has gone, the time having gone by within which a statutory body had to perform a statutory duty; but inasmuch as that point may be raised hereafter it seems to me not necessary to decide it now: but I must say that if the respondents are entitled to raise this objection and say that for the purposes of a rate this was not a good valuation list binding upon them, they ought to be able to raise that on appeal, and I think that that right of appeal, if it existed, has not been taken away. Of course upon the appeal there would have to be arguments upon the merits, and a decision upon the merits, as to whether or not the failure to give notice under section 9 prevented the valuation list being binding upon them; but that point I think is one which ought to have been raised on appeal. I do not think it is the class of objection that the magistrate ought to entertain when application is made to him for a distress warrant, it being, as I have said, something which does not fall within those objections named, or objections of the same kind, but something which goes to the validity of the right to assess or rate at a sum of money all the persons named in the assessment. For these reasons I think the appeal ought to succeed, and that the magistrate ought to have issued the distress warrant.

DARLING, J.—I am of the same opinion. The whole question really turns upon the point whether the respondents had lost or been deprived by what took place of not only their right to appeal, but of their power of appealing. I think they have not, and that being so, injustice and hardship, which was really the whole foundation of Mr. Bray's argument, does not arise. If the case had been as unjust and as hard as he represented it to be, then I think we must have decided in his favour; but it seems to me he did omit to notice a remedy which was open to him, which was pointed out very clearly to him by Mr. Ryde, and therefore the injustice which he apprehended does not occur.

CHANNELL, J.—This case is one of some difficulty. It really turns upon what is the true construction of this Act of 1869. Section 45 begins as follows: "The valuation list for the time being in force shall be deemed to have been duly made in accordance with this Act . . ." It is suggested by Mr. Bray that "the valuation list for the time being in force" must mean a properly made valuation list, and that no other is in force. If it meant that the section would read thus: "A valuation list duly made shall be deemed to have been duly made," and that the Legislature would never and could not possibly have enacted.

It seems to me that "the valuation list for the time being in force" is something which although not in fact duly made in accordance with the Act is to be deemed to have been duly made in accordance with the Act. I think the expression means that after the time when the valuation list is to come into force, and until the moment when the next valuation list has come into force, the valuation list shall be deemed to have been duly made. It is a case of time rather than anything else, and in substance comes to this, that it refers to a de facto valuation list in existence at a particular time which list is to be deemed to be made in accordance with the Act. The provision obviously is intended to cure for some purpose or another possible defects in the valuation list. The section then goes on to say the valuation lists shall be conclusive for certain purposes. Now, if conclusive for certain purposes means conclusive for all purposes whatever, it is obvious that a defect such as in the present case cannot be raised in answer to an application for a distress warrant. If, on the other hand, it is not conclusive for all purposes, it seems to me that, a fortiori, it would not be conclusive for the purpose of an appeal; so that either there is no remedy here and no answer to the distress warrant, because the provision is conclusive for all possible purposes, or there exists an appeal. If there does exist an appeal, I think it is quite clear on the cases my lord has referred to that this would come within the class of cases where, there being a possibility of appeal, there must be an appeal, and if the point is not raised by appeal it cannot be raised on the application for a distress warrant. I think those cases all depend on whether there is jurisdiction in the rating authority to make the rate, and whether the rate is good on the face of it. If the rating authority had jurisdiction to make a rate, any objection to the rate not apparent on the face of it cannot be raised on the application for the distress warrant. Such a rate as that it is the duty of the magistrate to enforce, and all the cases where objection can be taken upon application for a distress warrant—the well-known cases of non-occupation, property outside the parish, and so on—are merely instances of cases in which the rating authority had no jurisdiction to make a rate upon a person or upon the property as the case may be. The result seems to me to be that the argument for the appellants prevails, and that the appeal must be allowed.

Appeal allowed, without costs.

REX v. KENNEDY. (a.)

Justices — Discretion to issue summons — Proceedings against Jesuits upon information under Roman Catholic Relief Act, 1829 (10 Geo. 4, c. 7), s. 34—Indictable Offences Act, 1848 (11 & 12 Vict. c. 42), s. 9.

Upon an application by a private person for summonses against three Jesuit priests on an information which alleged that they had committed an offence under section 34 of the Roman Catholic Relief Act, 1829, in that they had, since the commencement of the Act, been admitted or become Jesuits within the United Kingdom, and had thereby committed a misdemeanour, the magistrate refused to grant the summonses upon the ground that the application was wrongly instituted, as the enactment should be enforced by the Crown and not by a private informer; and, further, that the information was too scanty and too bare a statement and insufficient to support an application for a criminal process; and, therefore, in exercise of the discretion conferred upon him by the Indictable Offences Act, 1848, he dismissed the information.

Held, upon a rule nisi for a mandamus, that the learned magistrate had exercised the discretion conferred upon him, and that in the exercise of such discretion he had declined to grant the summonses, and, therefore, that the court ought not to interfere.

(a.) Reported by E. G. STILLWELL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

In this case a rule nisi had been obtained at the instance of the Rev. Charles Stirling, on behalf of the Protestant Alliance, calling upon G. G. Kennedy, Esq., Metropolitan police magistrate, sitting at Marlborough-street, to show cause why a writ of mandamus should not issue directing him to grant summonses against three Jesuit priests, named the Rev. Sydney Smith, the Rev. Herbert Thurston, and the Rev. John Gerard.

The information upon which the summonses were asked for alleged that the three Jesuit priests in question had committed an offence under section 34 of 10 Geo. 4, c. 7, entitled "An Act for the relief of his Majesty's Roman Catholic Subjects," inasmuch as they had since the commencement of the Act been admitted or had become Jesuits within the United Kingdom, and had therefore committed a misdemeanour.

The section under which the proceedings were taken provides that: "In case any person shall, after the commencement of this Act, within any part of this United Kingdom be admitted or become a Jesuit or brother or member of any other such religious order, community, or society as aforesaid, such person shall be deemed and taken to be guilty of a misdemeanour, and being thereof lawfully convicted shall be sentenced and ordered to be banished from the United Kingdom for the term of his natural life." The information in each case merely alleged that the person charged had, since the commencement of the Act—namely, since 1829, been admitted and become a Jesuit within the United Kingdom, without giving any particulars. The application for the summonses was made on the 17th of January, 1902, when the learned magistrate reserved his decision. On the 24th of January he gave his decision refusing the summonses. After referring to section 34 of the Act under which the proceedings were taken, and to sections 28, 29, 30, 33, and 36, the learned magistrate proceeded as follows: "Now, it may be observed, first of all, that all those sections are practically obsolete, and no records of any proceedings under them are accessible, and in the words of the late Sir James Stephen, in his History of the Criminal Law, 'These provisions ever since they have been passed have been treated as a dead letter.' It would seem to be gathered from them that membership of this religious order is not a criminal condition in itself, and is only made so under certain circumstances. It must be more, in my view, than a mere matter of policy, especially when such serious consequences as banishment for life and transportation are involved; and they are, moreover, provisions which, in my opinion, should be enforced by the Crown and not by a private informer. The confirmation of this view is, I think, to be found in section 38 of the Act, which says 'that all penalties imposed by this Act shall and may be recovered as a debt due to his Majesty, by information to be filed in the name of his Majesty's Attorney-General.' It may be said that banishment, which is the penalty enacted by sections 29, 31, and 34, is not one of the penalties which is indicated in section 38, but the provisions are so far allied to the common subject-matter that the procedure to enforce any of them should be by way of information from the Crown Office itself. Therefore, in my judgment, this application should be refused upon the ground that it is wrongly instituted. The third ground arises on the initiation of the proceedings themselves on the words of section 34, because it says that after the passing of the Act one of the gentlemen was admitted and became a Jesuit contrary to the provisions of section 34 of the Act. Now I think that information is too scanty and too bare a statement, and insufficient to support an application for a criminal process. Therefore, in exercise of the discretion which is conferred upon me by the Indictable Offences Act, I dismiss the information." In answer to Mr. Avory, who appeared before the magistrate on behalf of the Rev. Charles Stirling, the the magistrate stated that he would refuse an application based on an amended information giving further particulars, because the first ground of his decision—namely, that the Crown should be the informer, would still remain. The learned magistrate further explained that he had used the words "practically obsolete" in speaking of the provisions of the sections in question because they were not actually obsolete. He did not put that as a ground of his decision; he put it as influencing his discretion.

Sir E. Clarke, K.C. (Hugo Young, K.C., and Dennis O'Conor with him), showed cause against the rule. The magistrate was right in holding that proceedings under the statute could only be taken at the instance of the Crown. That was the only way in which the provisions of the statute could be harmonised. Where the statute imposed a pecuniary penalty, that was recoverable only by the Crown. Further, where the statute imposed the punishment of banishment, it was necessary in order to carry out the punishment to invoke the executive authority of the Crown, which under section 35 the Crown might or might not exercise in its discretion. If the Crown did not choose to carry out the sentence of banishment, then the person proceeded against was free to remain in the United Kingdom without any ill consequences to himself; for in that case he would not be at large within the United Kingdom "without some lawful cause" within the meaning of section 34. If the words in that section "some lawful cause" do not refer to a case where the Crown in its discretion has refrained from carrying out the sentence of banishment, they are meaningless. Sections 28-38 of the Act all support this contention. Even supposing the magistrate was wrong in the construction he put on the Act, he nevertheless entertained the application for the summonses, and, that being so, his decision cannot be reversed by mandamus even though it were wrong in point of law: Ex parte Lewis, 37 W. R. 13, 21 Q. B. D. 191; Rex v. Bros, 85 L. T. Rep. 581; Reg. v. Byrde, 39 W. R. 171, 60 L. J. M. C. 17. These cases laid it down that if a magistrate heard and determined an application, and on its merits declined to grant a summons, the court would refuse to grant a mandamus. Before a mandamus could issue the justices must decline jurisdiction, and the court could not review their decision if they had come to it in good faith, although they might be wrong in law and in fact. It was clear in this case that the magistrate had not declined jurisdiction, and had exercised his discretion. Therefore the court would not interfere with the decision. He had come to the conclusion that the person before him was not a person to whom, according to the statute, he could grant a summons, and that is a matter of law. Even supposing the magistrate was wrong in holding that proceedings under the statute could only be taken by the Crown and that his decision in this respect could be reviewed, there remain the other grounds on which the magistrate has exercised his discretion. The information gave absolutely no particulars. It did not allege where the offence was committed or when, except that it was committed within the last seventy years. A magistrate is quite entitled to say that he will not act upon such an information. If the man who laid the information knew no more than that he would not be able to support the charge when it came on for hearing. If he did know more than that he was bound to put his knowledge into the information, so that the time, and place, and circumstances might be brought to the knowledge of the person upon whom the summons was served. So also he might refuse a summons with reference to the object with which the summons was sought. The magistrate had in this case exercised a discretion with reference to considerations of this character, and the court would not review the exercise of the magistrate's discretion in such circumstances.

They cited Reg. v. Cotham, 46 W. R. 512, [1898] 1 Q. B. 802.

H. Sutton, for the magistrate, also showed cause.

He referred to Stephen's History of the Criminal Law, vol. 2, p. 493, and to the report of the summing up of Lord Mansfield on the trial of James Webb, reported in Holliday's Life of Lord Mansfield, at p. 176.

Avory, K.C. (Biron with him), in support of the rule.—In substance the learned magistrate had declined jurisdiction on the ground that the prosecution could only be at the instance of the Crown. He had no right in law to form the view that it might be public policy that the prosecution should be by the Crown. If he had a right to form such a view with regard to this Act he must have the same right with regard to every other Act of Parliament. Any private person has the same right to initiate a criminal proceeding as the Crown. A magistrate is not justified in refusing to put in force, or to allow anyone else to put in force, a statute because of its ancient date. This Act is not a dead letter and has never been treated as such by the Legislature.

He referred to Stephen's History of the Criminal Law, vol. 1, p. 495,; Reg. v. Adamson, 24 W. R. 250, 1 Q. B. D. 201; Reg. v. Boteler, 12 W. R. 466, 4 B. & S. 959; Ex parte Wason, 17 W. R. 881, L. R. 4 Q. B. 573; and Reg. v. Ingham, 14 Q B. 396.] There is nothing in the Act of 1829 to indicate that a peculiar rule depriving the private prosecutor of his ordinary rights is to prevail with reference to offences under that Act.

W. B. Campbell, amicus curiæ, called the Lord Chief Justice's attention to the dictum of Porter, M.R., in the case of Roche v. Macdermott, [1901] 1 L. R. Ir. 394, at p. 402.

Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J.—This case certainly presents very considerable difficulty, and it is one which has given us very anxious consideration. I do not think the principles of law which have to be applied are at all difficult of statement, but of course when you come to apply them very different and more difficult considerations arise. If an inferior tribunal has declined jurisdiction or thought that it has no jurisdiction through wrongly construing an Act of Parliament, there is no doubt that under ordinary circumstances the mandamus will go to order the magistrate or the inferior tribunal to exercise its jurisdiction. If, on the other hand, a magistrate not understanding the law, and not improperly applying the law in the matter of his jurisdiction, exercises a discretion that he will or will not allow the process of the court, then, at any rate in the clauses under the Act we have to consider—namely, 11 & 12 Vict. c. 42, his discretion cannot be inquired into.

It is not necessary to go through all the cases, but I think it desirable to call attention to one or two of the cases which illustrate the law before I proceed to apply that law to the facts of this case; and I think it is the more necessary, because it has been suggested in the course of the argument by Mr. Avory, in his able argument in support of the rule, that the case of Reg. v. Ingham, which was decided in the year 1849, and has been recognized as good law in recent cases, could only be supported on some different principle to that which I referred to in the course of the argument. In the case of Reg. v. Ingham it was decided that "when an information is laid before justices of the peace for an indictable misdemeanour, it is in the discretion of the justices to hear it, or refuse to hear and leave the complaining party to originate his prosecution before a grand jury." The case was an attempt to indict a person for perjury. It cannot be said that there was doubt as to there being primâ facie evidence of the offence. The magistrate had declined to allow the case to go on, on the ground of the pending of some proceedings in the Ecclesiastical Court; the court declined to interfere with that discretion; and Coleridge, J., at the end of the trial—and I think it is important in reference to this case—says: "The refusal of this rule does not prevent a trial if the prosecutor chooses to go before a grand jury. We only say that we will not oblige the justices to hear an information." In the case of Reg. v. Adamson, which was a case in which the court did make the rule absolute, the rule laid down by Cockburn, C.J., was that the court has, in the absence of express statutory provision, no appellate jurisdiction to review the decision of magistrates who have once heard a case and decided it, in a matter within their jurisdiction. If I could see my way to the conclusion that the magistrates had considered this evidence and given a decision upon it I should certainly say that the court could not act upon the matter further or send the case back." Then the Chief Justice went on to point out that he came to the conclusion that the magistrates in that case acted on extraneous and extrajudicial matter, and that they were influenced by their distaste for the views and doctrines promulgated at a certain meeting which was the subject of, and which led to, the proceedings. Blackburn, J., who concurred with the Chief Justice's judgment in that case, practically said that they could not interfere with the discretion; they could interfere, and should interfere, if the justices had declined to exercise their discretion on an improper ground. That case and the case of Reg. v. Ingham were referred to in the judgment in Reg. v. Bride, and I will read one passage from the considered judgment of Williams and Stephen, JJ., who, having referred to the principle to which I have made short reference, said this: "This seems to be the outcome of the decisions, and in particular, of Reg. v. Adamson and Ex parte Lewis. Blackburn, J., in his judgment in the former case, points out that the words in 11 & 12 Vict. c. 42, s. 9, 'if they shall think fit'—which are the words in this section also, it being under the same Act—'show that the justices have a discretion—and the mandamus in that case was granted expressly on the ground that the justices had not exercised their discretion. The justices may, however, it would seem, in the exercise of their discretion, refuse to issue a summons even though there is evidence before them of an alleged indictable misdemeanour, if they consider that the issue of the summons would be vexatious or improper." These cases seem to me to be illustrations of the rule which I endeavoured to state for myself at the beginning of my judgment. Now when the rule was moved before us—and I make no complaint against anybody, because one can understand how it arose—all that was stated in the affidavit was that the learned magistrate had refused to grant the summons upon the following grounds: That the statute 10 Geo. 4, c. 7, was practically obsolete, and that proceedings under section 34 of the Act could only be taken according to the provisions of the Act at the instance of the Crown by information at the Crown Office or otherwise, and could not be initiated by a private individual. That was supplemented by a statement made perfectly accurately by Mr. Avory that, after the decision of the magistrate upon the point, the information before him stating no more than that three gentlemen had, after the year 1829, been admitted and become Jesuits within the United Kingdom, the learned magistrate being asked whether any alteration in the form of the information would remove his objection or lead him to entertain it, said, No; and I have decided this case from the point of view of assuming that Mr. Avory had stated in greater detail in his information anything which could be cured as a statement of fact, although I must not be supposed to say that even if I had taken a different view to that which I take in this case, there might not be a duty to exercise a discretion, or a right to exercise a discretion, arising upon the particular circumstances which were brought before the magistrate in any particular case. Now, that being so, I have done my best to see if I could get at what was the real decision of the magistrate.

I will read the passage of the learned magistrate's judgment which seems to me to show that in reality he dealt with this case as a question of discretion, and did not deal with the case upon the ground either that the Act was obsolete or that the Act could not be put in force by a private individual. He says: "It would seem to be gathered from them that membership of this religious order is not a criminal condition in itself, and is only made so under certain circumstances. It must be more in my view than a mere matter of policy, especially when such serious consequences as banishment for life and transportation are involved, and they are moreover provisions which, in my opinion, should be enforced by the Crown, and not by a private informer. The confirmation of this view is, I think, to be found in section 38 of the Act, which says 'that all penalties imposed by this Act shall and may be recoverable as a debt due to his Majesty by information filed in in the name of his Majesty's Attorney-General.' It may be said that banishment, which is the penalty enacted by sections 29, 30, and 34, is not one of the penalties that is indicated in section 38, but the provisions are so far allied to the common subject-matter that the procedure to enforce any of them should, I think, be by way of information from the Crown Office itself. Therefore, in my judgment, this application should be refused upon the ground that it is wrongly initiated. The third ground arises on the initiation of the proceedings themselves on the words of section 34, because it says that after the passing of the Act one of the gentlemen was admitted and became a Jesuit contrary to the provisions of section 34 of the Act. Now I think that information is too scanty and too bare a statement, and insufficient to support an application for a criminal process. Therefore, in exercise of the discretion which is conferred upon me by the Indictable Offences Act, I dismiss the information." Mr. Avory then asks him as to "whether it would be of any avail to present an amended information giving further particulars, or whether we may take it that you refuse it on all the grounds which you have stated. The Magistrate: I think you may take it that I should refuse the application because the first ground—namely, that the Crown should be the informer, would still stand. Mr. Avory: That objection would still stand, and that would, I understand from you, apply to any amended information. The Magistrate: Yes, that would apply to any amended information. Mr. Avory: Also, I presume, the ground which you first stated—that in your view the statute was obsolete. The Magistrate: With regard to that I used the words 'practically obsolete' because it is not actually obsolete. I do not put that as a ground. I put that rather as influencing my discretion. Mr. Avory: I thought it right to ask you that, because if you intended to base your decision upon that ground, I ought to tell you that I have since discovered that as late as 1898 a Bill was introduced into Parliament for the purpose of repealing these sections, and Parliament refused to do so. The Magistrate: I am much obliged to you; I had not found that out. It is a question of discretion. I do not put that as the ground of my decision at all. Mr. Avory: That leaves it open, of course, to test the question in a superior court. The Magistrate: Yes, there may be other remedies open to the applicant to proceed in a different way no doubt." Reading that fairly I think that is a statement that upon the circumstances of the case before him the magistrate came to the conclusion that he ought not to issue a summons.

Now, that I may not be thought to be merely covering the matter up with what I call general observations, I should like to state what I understand from the earlier part of the magistrate's judgment to have been the matters he took into his consideration. He took into his consideration, first, that the Act had never been put into force; I mean by the Act never having been put into force that these sections of the Act had never been put in force. Having gone through these sections of the Act he comes to the conclusion, which I think was the right conclusion, that the Act was for the purpose of getting the Jesuits out of the country and not for punishing criminally, if I may use the expression, the individual Jesuit. I think all the sections show that. He further took the view that it was not an Act, or at any rate these sections of the Act were not provisions that a private person ought to institute proceedings in respect of, but that those proceedings should be taken by the Crown or by representatives of the Crown.

Now it seems to me that all those three matters were matters that he was entitled to take into his consideration in exercising his discretion. I do not want to repeat anything that I have said in the course of the argument, but I think that some of the cases that I put to Mr. Avory would indicate that it is impossible to say that there is no discretion simply because there is primâ facie evidence that an indictable offence has been committed, and the authorities to which I have referred in my opinion negative any such proposition. I must also say for myself that I think the fact that the proceedings were not within the Vexatious Indictment Act has a very material bearing upon this Act. I quite agree with Mr. Avory that under ordinary circumstances it is not convenient that there should be an ordinary criminal prosecution without the preliminary proceedings by summons, and by committal for trial; but upon the other hand when you have such cases as this I think the magistrate, as was pointed out in Reg. v. Ingham, is entitled to take into his consideration the fact that his decision is not final but that a bill can be preferred by any person, and that a private person can present that bill of indictment, if he is disposed to do so. The fact is that this in any point of view is a very special Act of Parliament. Its provisions are, of course, unique, and we have no practice under it, which can be said to be any contemporaneous exposition or interpretation of it, and therefore the discretion which a magistrate should apply to such a case must be of necessity different to that which he should apply to ordinary crimes and ordinary criminal offences. For myself I wish to say that I by no means suggest that it is any legal bar to proceedings in the case that they are taken by a private individual. If the magistrate had proceeded upon the view that the Crown, and the Crown only, could take proceedings, I think he would have been wrong, and I think he would have been ousted from his jurisdiction, but on the other hand I think he was perfectly entitled to take into consideration, having regard to the provisions of the Act, that this was not a proceeding in which he was bound to issue a summons at the instance of an ordinary informer. I mention that because I am as anxious as anyone can be that the provisions of the criminal law should be put in force, and that magistrates should not be tempted to say that they refuse to entertain proceedings by any outside considerations or any distaste or dislike for any Act of Parliament. That is not what, in my opinion, arises in this case. I have said already that the fact that they have never been put in force, the fact that its provisions point to persons being got out of the country, and not to what I may call ordinary offences against private individuals, are circumstances which the magistrate could take into his consideration, and also he could take into his consideration that this was a summons taken out by a private individual, and that was one of the circumstances upon which he might exercise his discretion. In coming to the conclusion as I do that the real substance of this is that the magistrate exercised his discretion, and declined to grant the summons in the exercise of his discretion, I think we ought not to interfere with it, and that therefore this rule must be discharged.

DARLING, J.—I am of the same opinion, but I think the magistrate really affected here to do two things. I think he did understand, and I think he did express in one part of his judgment, the opinion that proceedings could not under this Act of Parliament be initiated at the instance of a private person, but only by the Attorney-General acting as such. In that I desire to say I think he was wrong. If he held that opinion, and I think he did, and I think in one place he expressed it, I think he was wrong. To my mind it is clear that the Act is open to enforcement by a private individual, and I make this observation for this reason, that it may be that upon an application for a summons under this Act made to some other magistrate, another magistrate might take the view, if this were not said very plainly, that this court understood the magistrate to be right when he expressed that opinion that only the Crown, acting by the Attorney-General, could put the Act in force. I do not think any other magistrate could take that view. It seems to me a private person may be entitled to a summons, and a magistrate in proper circumstances might lawfully and properly grant one, and the case might be heard. But I think here in this case the magistrate did exercise his discretion upon matters as to which he was entitled to exercise it. The kind of discretion that a magistrate should exercise, and the kind that he is not entitled to exercise, have often been laid down, and I do not think really there is a much better example of it to be found than is given in the quotation from Lord Coke, which is in Rooke's case, 5 Rep. 100*a*, where he says: "For discretion is a science or understanding to discern between falsity and truth, between wrong and right, between shadow and substance, between equity and colourable glosses and pretences, and not to do according to their wills and private affections, for as one saith, talis discretio discretionem confundit." If the magistrate here had acted simply upon his own will or private liking for an Act of Parliament, or dislike for an Act of Parliament, he would then not have exercised his discretion in a proper way. But here I think, having regard to all the matters which he had regard to, and to which my lord has specially directed attention, he did exercise his discretion in the sense in which a magistrate may lawfully exercise the discretion of a judge, and not of a mere private individual.

I desire, however, to go a little further. I desire expressly to say this, that I think a magistrate may claim and may exercise a wider discretion in the case of proceedings under such statutes as this one is, statutes banishing people for their opinions, than any other statutes that I am acquainted with which appear on the statute books. Whatever may be the reason why they were passed, they were statutes which persecute opinion, and acts that are to my mind against the genius and spirit of this age. For example, here is a statute which says: "The Jesuit shall not exist in this country—that the Jesuit is to be banished." At the same time a Catholic school may earn a grant of public money, and, so far as I know, a Jesuit may teach in a Catholic school, and may help to earn that grant. All these things I think the magistrate may fairly bear in mind when he is asked to grant a summons in such a case as that. Now the words of Lord Mansfield have been referred to, and I think there is justification for the kind of thing the magistrate said in what Lord Mansfield said. Lord Mansfield was one the greatest judges who ever sat in this court—he is described, and properly described, in his epitaph in Westminster Abbey, as his country's pride. What did he say? Here in this book are two instances given of his laying down the law upon penal statutes—statutes persecuting opinion. One is in the case of a statute directed against the Quakers, the other is in the case of a statute directed against the Roman Catholics; and in each case it is perfectly plain that Lord Mansfield had regard to the enforcement of this law not only by laws and statutes in the books, but having regard to the circumstances of the time in which he was called upon to enforce it, and he says he does not dispute the necessity for those laws against the Catholic religion. The case was Payne's case, where Payne sued for a penalty as a common informer, and Lord Mansfield goes through the statutes and says: "There are statutes against priests—the first is that of Elizabeth," and so on "There was another made after, enacting that if a priest was convicted of saying Mass he was to forfeit two hundred marks and suffer one year's imprisonment, but neither does Payne go upon this statute, for here there is no reward for the informer. The third was made in King William's reign (11 & 12 Wm. 3, c. 4), soon after the Revolution. This is the statute Payne aims at, because here is one hundred pounds the country is to pay him if he can convict the defendant." Lord Mansfield draws attention there to the fact that that statute was made soon after the Revolution. It may have been very necessary to make it, and it may have been very reasonable to make it; but how does he go on? He says as to the Jesuits and so on: "Neither was it ever the design of Legislatures to have these laws enforced by every common informer, but only at proper times and seasons," such as immediately after the Revolution, obviously, "when they saw the necessity, for it and by proper persons appointed by themselves for that purpose"; and then he concludes with these very remarkable words: "And yet, more properly speaking, they were never designed to be enforced at all, but were made in terrorem." If Lord Mansfield might have regard to all that, it seems to me, looking at the statutes of this peculiar character, so may I, and so might the learned magistrate, and I do think that he was justified, having regard to the kind of statute under which he was asked to issue a summons, having regard to the circumstances which are a matter of history, and which he must know. of how the statute came to be passed, having regard to the fact that the Crown had never attempted to put it in force, and that since it was passed people had been allowed to take part in public life and public opinion in this country holding the opinions that these people are charged with holding—I think having regard to all this, and having regard to all the circumstances to which my lord has specially directed attention, that he was justified in exercising his discretion, and that he did not exercise it simply according to his own will or caprice, but that he exercised it for good reasons which can be given and that he was entitled especially to do so when he was asked to enforce such a statute, and a statute of such a class as the class to which this statute belongs. I am therefore of opinion that there is no danger in holding—and that was the only thing I was anxious about in this case—as we hold to-day, that the law upon other statutes may be strained to allow magistrates to refuse proceedings which they ought properly to allow to be initiated.

CHANNELL, J.—I agree in the judgment of the court. I prefer to base my judgment upon the grounds stated by the Lord Chief Justice, and upon those alone. With reference to those which my brother Darling has just laid down, the matters were not brought before us in the argument, and I prefer to express no opinion upon those matters except that in my view this statute is not a statute merely directed against opinions, nor do I think that Lord Mansfield, in the passages that have been quoted to us from his life, was laying down the law in a way that we ought to recognise. The opinions of an eminent man, as he was, of course deserve our respect; but so far as I understand it, the views that he laid down to the jury have never got into the Law Reports, and have never been treated as a statement of the law. He was not trying, as I understand it, a criminal case, but an action brought by a common informer to recover and put into his own pocket a penalty; an action which has never met with a great amount of favour, and has seldom, I suppose, succeeded in recent years—at any rate unless the judge summed up in a very different way from that in which Lord Mansfield seems to have summed up in that case. One is not surprised that the jury found for the defendant in that case. But the matters which we have to consider in this case seem to me to be very different indeed from that, but I do think that these were matters that this magistrate, in the exercise of his discretion, was entitled to take into consideration. I should content myself entirely with a statement that I agree with the judgment of the Lord Chief Justice, if it were not that matters had been introduced in argument in this case as to which I think it is extremely desirable that there should be no mistake hereafter as to what it is that we do in fact lay down. Now these clauses in this statute appear to have been passed, as the preamble to section 28 states, for the purpose of the gradual suppression and final prohibition of these religious orders, and one sees that the object is to get all members of those orders gradually expelled from this country. Persons who were resident here at the time, whether natural born subjects or foreigners, and who were members of any of these religious orders, were to be allowed to stay here conditionally upon their registering themselves. Natural born subjects who were at the time members of the order were entitled to come here and to get the same protection as if they had happened to be here at the time of the passing of the Act, provided that within a certain time after their coming here they registered themselves. All those persons in the course of time would die, and the persons to whom the special privileges of staying here were given by the Act of Parliament would in the course of a great number of years disappear; and these provisions were made that no person being admitted to these religious orders elsewhere should come here, or that they should be admitted here and be here. The effect of those would be as stated in the preamble to effect the gradual suppression and final prohibition of these religious orders, and it seems to me it would have been done, not because of their opinions, but because they were supposed at that time, rightly or wrongly, to be mischievous persons; to be persons whom it was desirable not to have in this country; and the mode in which this was done was to say that their being here should be a misdemeanour, and that upon their being lawfully convicted they were to be sentenced and ordered to be banished. That is a peculiar sentence, not punishing them for being members of these religious orders, but directing that they being members of these religious orders, and not coming within the privilege of persons who were here at the time of the passing of the Act of Parliament, should be told to leave the country. Now it is put in the form of a criminal offence, and as it is put in the form of a criminal offence, it appears to me that a private individual is entitled to prosecute for it. As Mr. Avory said, it is an important constitutional principle that a private individual may set the criminal law in motion—at his own risk, in certain cases, of course, but that he may do so. To hold the contrary appears, to use an illustration of which one is reminded by the special subject of this kind of prosecution, very like reviving—if that is the proper expression for something which I suppose on the best authority never existed—the dispensing power of the Crown that was the subject of so much trouble in the days gone by. I think it is an important principle to hold that except where the special terms of the Act of Parliament direct the contrary (of which there are some instances) that a private individual may institute criminal prosecutions, and if this magistrate held, and I think he did express his opinion to the contrary of that as regards this Act of Parliament—if he had proceeded upon that alone I should think we ought to direct the mandamus to go. But in my view although he expressed that opinion, and stated it as one of the grounds of his decision, he stated it only as one of the grounds, and he went on as it were to say: Even if I am wrong in saying that a private individual cannot initiate these proceedings, at any rate I am entitled to take it into account as one of the matters to be dealt with when I come to consider whether I should exercise my discretion.

In that view I think he was right, and taking that into account, and taking into account the fact that proceedings had not in fact been taken during the seventy odd years since the Act of Parliament was passed, he was entitled to take into consideration those matters, and to say: I will not issue the summons. If I were preventing you from taking these proceedings and raising the question at all, possibly I might, but I am not doing so. You are entitled to present a bill to the grand jury, and if the bill is presented there will be a direction of the learned judge to the grand jury upon the law applicable to this matter, as to which my opinion is what I have expressed, but as to which I agree there may be doubts, and in the exercise of my discretion I think that is the better way of dealing with the matter. If he has said that, I think it is impossible for us to say that he is wrong, and that if we were to issue a mandamus, we should be doing that which the court never does upon mandamus—namely, directing a man how to do his duty. The function of a mandamus is to direct the person to whom it is addressed, whether a magistrate or anyone else, to do his duty, but not to direct him to do his duty in any particular mode. The mandamus which we should issue, if we issued one here, would be to hear and determine this application for a summons. In my view he has heard it and determined it, because he has taken into consideration matters which he was entitled to take into consideration, and, having taken them into consideration. he has decided not to issue the summons.

LONDON AND INDIA DOCKS CO. (LIMITED) v. WOOLWICH, MAYOR AND ALDERMEN OF THE BOROUGH OF. (a.)

Local government—Rating—Land covered with water—Right of appeal—Public Health Acts, 1848 (11 & 12 Vict. c. 63), s. 88, and 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 55), s. 211—Metropolis Valuation Act, 1867 (32 & 33 Vict. c. 67), s. 45.

Land wholly covered with water was, in accordance with section 88 of the Public Health Act. 1848, and section 211 of the Public Health Act, 1875, under the authority of which Acts rates were formerly levied in Woolwich, only rated at one-fourth of its net annual value.

Held, that, in accordance with section 4 of the London Government Act, 1899, the London and India Docks Co. were still entitled to that exemption although Woolwich is now governed by the Metropolis Management Act, 1855 (18 & 19 Vict. c. 120).

Held, also, that the appellants were entitled to appeal against the amount of the rate.

Case stated by quarter sessions.

The case stated set out the following facts:

The appellants are the owners and occupiers of certain hereditaments in the metropolitan borough of Woolwich, and in a general rate made for the said borough on the 21st of April, 1900, and allowed by justices on the 1st of May, 1901, the appellants were rated as the occupiers of the said hereditaments upon the full net annual value thereof and to the full amount of such rate.

The hereditaments included in the said rate consisted in part of land covered with water, and they were assessed before the 1st of April, 1901, at one-fourth part only of the net annual value.

The appellants objected to the valuation, and on the 26th of October, 1901, the committee heard and decided such objection on the basis of an alteration in the amount of the said assessments.

No objection was made by the appellants to the description of the said hereditaments.

By the Public Health Act, 1852 (15 & 16 Vict. c. 69), the Public Health Act, 1848 (11 & 12 Vict. c. 63), was made applicable to Woolwich.

By the Metropolis Management Act, 1855 (18 & 19 Vict. c. 120). Woolwich was placed in the metropolis, but in accordance with section 22 the rates continued to be made in Woolwich under the authority of the Public Health Acts.

By section 343 of the Public Health Act, 1875, the Public Health Act, 1848, was repealed, but by section 2 it was not to apply to the metropolis save as by this Act is expressly provided, and as Woolwich was not mentioned in the repealing sections the Public Health Act, 1848, still continued in force in that borough. The Public Health (London) Act, 1891 (54 & 55 Vict. c. 76), applied to Woolwich certain sections of the Public Health Act, 1875, including sections 209 and 227, which relate to the making of rates. The effect of the foregoing enactments, that previous to 1875 district rates were levied under the authority of the Public Health Act, 1848, and after that date under the Public Health Act, 1875.

By section 211 of the Public Heath Act, 1875, repeating verbatim section 28 of the Public Health Act, 1848, it is provided "that the occupier of any land covered with water . . . shall be assessed in respect of the same in the proportion of only one-fourth part of the net annual value thereof."

By section 19 of the London Government Act, 1899, it was enacted that a scheme under this Act should place Woolwich under the general law applying to metropolitan boroughs and provide for the repeal of the application thereto of the provisions of the Public Health Acts and the other Acts not applying to London, and place Woolwich under the Metropolis Management Acts, 1855 to 1893, and other Acts applying to London, and sections 15. and 16 of the Act provided that the committee of the Privy Council may make such schemes. Section 10 of the London Government Act, 1899, provides that any scheme under the Act shall make provisions for "protecting the owners and occupiers of any hereditament which is exempt from any rate or liable to be assessed hereto at a less amount than other hereditaments."

In the London (Woolwich) Scheme, which was confirmed by the Privy Council on the 7th of August, 1900, the words above used were repeated, but in other respects it repealed the provisions of the Public Health Acts and provided that Woolwich should be governed by the Metropolis Management Acts, 1855 to 1893, and other Acts applying to London.

The London (Rating) Scheme, 1901, contained the following provisions: (1) In levying the general rate after the 1st of April, 1901, effect shall be given to any deduction from any existing rate (whether that exemption is given by way of reduced assessment or levying a differential rate in the pound or in any other measure by means of the deduction from the total amount of the general rate, which would otherwise be payable in respect of any hereditament to which the exemption or proportionate part corresponding to the exemption of the amount produced by the rate in the pound, which is treated as levied for the purposes in respect of which the exemption exists, or in the case of a total exemption equal to the whole amount so produced.

On the above facts the appellants contended that the effect of the above orders and schemes was to preserve to them the exemption in the case of land partly covered with water.

The respondents contended that section 211 of the Woolwich Improvement Act now having been repealed, the appellants were not entitled to any exemption, and that it had not been preserved by the schemes and orders above referred to. They also took the point that by the Metropolis Valuation Act, 1867 (32 & 33 Vict. c. 67), s. 45, the valuation list is to be conclusive evidence of the amount, and as the appellants had only objected to the amounts before the assessment committee they could not appeal.

W. C. Ryde (Balfour Browne, K.C., with him), for the appellants —First, with regard to the preliminary point, the valuation list is not conclusive on all points. For instance, when the rated person is wrongly described (Smith v. Lambeth Assessment Committee, 31 W. R. 3, 10 Q. B. D. 327), or when there is an exemption, as here, by statute: Gordon v. Williamson, 40 W. R. 692, [1892] 2 Q. B. 459; Reg. v. Civil Engineers, 28 W. R. 253, 5 Q. B. D. 48. We could not have appealed against the valuation list as we did not know then what the scheme was going to be. On the main point it is clear that the Legislature did intend to preserve our exemption, and the scheme has given effect to that intention.

Marshall, K.C. (Courthope Munroe with him).—The appellants are not entitled now to come and say that the valuation list was not correct, as they are properly described in the list, and objection cannot now be taken to the amount. With regard to the exemption, the exemption of the respondents is not preserved by any express words, and that as the Public Health Act, 1875, s. 211, has been repealed in its application to Woolwich they cannot now rely on it.

Ryde replied.

Cur. adv. vult.

March 3.—Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J.—The actual specific facts of the case are somewhat complicated, and I do not think there is anything to be gained by stating them in detail, as they must be gathered from the special case in the event of its being necessary to consider the facts of this case as bearing upon any other. The broad question is this. Prior to the passing of the London Government Act of 1899 the district of Woolwich, in which this property was situate, had been subject to the Public Health Act, 1875, and under that Act it is well known there was an exemption, that land covered with water should only pay at the rate of one-fourth in respect of certain rates. The district was also subject at that time to the Metropolis (Valuation) Act, 1869. Therefore for the purpose of procedure under rating, the procedure of the Metropolis (Valuation) Act had to be followed. By the London Government Act of 1899, it was provided by section 19, sub-section 1, that "a scheme under this Act shall provide for placing Woolwich under the general law applying to metropolitan boroughs, and for the repeal of the application thereto of the provisions of the Public Health Acts." The Act also contained a provision, section 16 (1), that "a scheme under this Act shall provide for all the expenses of a borough council being paid out of the general rate and for the discontinuance of a separate sewers rate and a separate lighting rate which were rates as to which under certain circumstances there would be this lesser liability, but shall make provision for protecting the interests of owners and occupiers of any hereditament which is exempt from any rate or liable to be assessed thereto at a less amount than other hereditaments."

Later on there was a scheme which came into operation on, I think, the 9th of March, 1901, which did provide for a particular method of maintaining the exemption. It is not necessary to describe it. It is stated in par. 1, sub-section 2, of the scheme, and it practically maintained the one-fourth exemption, assuming it to be valid and binding in a proper case by a particular method of levying the rate. The particular valuation list on which the question arises was one for 1900. I ought to say it was attempted by the respondents to charge the appellants with an assessment for the full amount. The respondents justified that on two grounds. They said, first, that by the provisions of the Act of 1899 it was intended to bring Woolwich within the general law applying to metropolitan boroughs, and therefore inasmuch as some parts of the metropolitan boroughs at any rate had not got the exemption given by section 211 of the Public Health Act, 1875, in this respect, though they had certain other exemptions under certain other Acts, it was not intended that this exemption under the Public Health Act should be continued in Woolwich. We are all of opinion that that objection cannot be maintained. We think it was clearly intended that although Woolwich and the more outlying places were to come within the metropolis, the scheme should continue that exemption. At any rate, if the scheme has continued that exemption, it cannot be said it is not valid and binding. Hence the objection on the merits, we think, does not prevail. The more troublesome and difficult question is whether or not it was open to applicants to raise this point because they had not been before the assessment committee and obtained a distribution of the rateable value, which in the total was not objected to, between the part of the land which was not exempted property and the part which was. The assessment was on total, £15,000, I think, for the dock with tidal basin and quays, and although the total amount was agreed to after discussion, the appellants had asked the assessment committee to distribute between so much of the hereditament as was land covered with water and so much as was not. We are also of opinion that this objection cannot prevail and the appellants are entitled to raise the point. The original right of appeal goes back to the Act of 17 Geo. 2. There was previous legislation which one need only notice to add that it does not apply. The Parochial Assessment Act of 1831 and the Union Assessment Committee Acts Acts of 1862-1864. These do not apply to the metropolis, but I must not be thought as expressing an opinion that this kind of objection ought to have been raised before the assessment committee even under those Acts. I express no opinion because it is not necessary. I doubt whether any owner of a mixed hereditament can force the assessment committee to make the subdivision. There are certainly cases in which he could not, as in the case of a man who has got a park with a lake in it, but it is not necessary for us to say more than that we need not decide the question. Of course it is very convenient that there should be the subdivision, because it possibly then provides a standard which the parties would acquiesce in as to how these differential rates should be levied. When we come to the metropolis the case is, of course, somewhat different, and the rights and liabilities of the properties depend upon the Metropolis (Valuation) Act. Under that Act it was contended by Mr. Marshall (I do not pause to notice the machinery, which is very well known, as to how the parties proceeded) that because it was provided by section 45 that the valuation list shall be conclusive evidence of the gross and rateable value of the several hereditaments included therein, therefore the appellants were not entitled for the purpose of this rate either to contest the total amount or to raise the point that it ought to have been subdivided so as to enable them to raise this point. If there had been anything in the Metropolis Valuation Act which showed that the question was intended to be raised at that stage, I think there would have been something in Mr.

Marshall's point; but it is, in my opinion, much too late to contend that the right of appeal on other grounds than those mentioned in section 45 has been taken away.

There have been a number of cases in which it has been held that upon an appeal against the rate you can raise other questions than those determined by the assessment or by the sessions upon appeal against the valuation as, for instance, non-occupation or impropriety of the rate in other respects, and I see no reason why we should hold that a person is not entitled to raise this question, that he is the occupier in respect of the whole or part of the property subject only to the differential rate. In fact, when I put the point to Mr. Marshall he did not dispute that if the whole of the property was land covered with water and the man had been rated in respect of the whole he would be entitled on appeal against the rate to say in respect of that rate he was only liable to pay one-third or one-fourth as the case might be. I am of opinion that the old right of appeal in respect of such a matter still remains, and that the only effect of the Valuation Act for this purpose is that the total valuation is conclusive, and if possibly in some case there has been a subdivision settled by the original adjudication of the assessment committee or on a subsequent appeal the amount of the rateable value of that separated item in the list has been settled then the valuation list would be conclusive. I cannot hold that there was any obligation upon the appellants to get this subdivision made at the stage of the making of the valuation list. There is also another ground which appears to us to be conclusive in favour of the appellants in this case. I think Mr. Ryde was well founded in the argument that he made, that at the time the valuation test was going through its initial stages the company really did not know what the case would be. They did not know what steps would be taken, or in what way I should say the scheme would provide for the preservation of their protection, and I think that within the principle of Lord Bowen's judgment in Gordon v. Williamson it was not possible to contend that in that state of things the company were bound to get what I may call a hypothetical division in view of what might possibly happen. Speaking for myself, both on the special grounds of this case and on the general view of the construction of the Metropolis Valuation Act, I am of opinion that it was no bar to this appeal. It is obvious that our conclusion is in accordance with justice, as we do not think it was intended to remove the exemption either under the Act or under the scheme. The result is this appeal must be allowed. The parties agree about the figures.

Darling, J.—I agree.

Channell, J.—I agree with my lord, but I think I ought to say that my view of the matter is that, so far as any hereditaments in the future are concerned—that is to say, if a new dock were made in Woolwich, it was intended to apply to Woolwich the general law in the metropolis and not the law outside. I understood that section 10 (1) providing that a provision should be made for protecting the interests of owners and occupiers of any hereditament which is exempt from any rate and the provision that was in fact made in the scheme, effect shall be given to any exemption from any existing rate of any hereditament to which the exemption applies—that it was intended to prevent the particular persons in Woolwich who had at the time got hereditaments of that character from being rated for the future any higher. That is why I do not think that it is contradictory to the express enactment that Woolwich should be put under the general law applicable to the metropolis; I think it is so put, and therefore if any dock were made it would come under the one law and not under the other. It is on that ground that the point on the merits, as it has been called, seems to me perfectly clear. That is the answer to the argument which otherwise was quite a logical argument, that Mr. Marshall put before us, that Woolwich is specially dealt with.

Lord Alverstone, L.C.J. — The point had not occurred to me. I do not differ from my brother Channell except as to this, that I should like to hear that particular point argued. It does not arise in this case.

From Chan. Div. (Vaughan Williams, Romer, and Stirling, L.JJ.) — May 28; June 20.

In re Sidebottom.
Beeley v. Waterhouse. (a.)

Charity—Gift of proceeds of sale of real estate—Retention of land unsold—Leave of court—Mortmain and Charitable Uses Act, 1891 (54 & 55 Vict. c. 73), ss. 3, 5, 6, and 8.

Where land is devised to trustees upon trust to sell the same and hand the proceeds of sale over to a charity, the subject-matter of the gift being "personal estate arising from or connected with land," which is excepted from the definition of land contained in the Mortmain and Charitable Uses Act, 1891, sections 5 and 6 of that Act do not apply, and it is competent to the trustees to retain the land unsold for more than a year after the death of the testator without obtaining the leave of the court therefor under section 5 of the Act, though it would probably be expedient for them to obtain such leave under the general jurisdiction of the court to administer trusts. In such a case section 8 of the Mortmain and Charitable Uses Act, 1891, has no application to the land devised by the will, unless the charity has money to purchase land under the provisions of some other will.

This was an appeal against a decision of Buckley, J., which raised a question of some importance as to the operation of the Mortmain and Charitable Uses Act, 1891. That Act, by section 3, provides that "'Land' in the Mortmain and Charitable Uses Act, 1888, and in this Act, shall include tenements and hereditaments, corporeal or incorporeal, of any tenure, but not money secured on land or other personal estate arising from or connected with land."

By section 5, "Land may be assured by will to or for the benefit of any charitable use, but, except as hereinafter provided, such land shall, notwithstanding anything in the will contained to the contrary, be sold within one year from the death of the testator, or such extended period as may be determined by the High Court or any judge thereof sitting at chambers, or by the Charity Commissioners."

Section 6 provides that, after the expiration of the time limited for sale, "the land unsold shall vest forthwith in the official trustee of charity lands," and shall be sold by order of the commissioners.

(a.) Reported by J. I. Stirling, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Section 8 empowers the High Court, or any judge, or the commissioners, "if satisfied that land assured by will to or for the benefit of any charitable use, or proposed to be purchased out of the personal estate by will directed to be laid out in the purchase of land, is required for actual occupation for the purposes of the charity and not as an investment, by order to sanction the retention or acquisition, as the case may be, of such land."

In the present case the late Mr. A. K. Sidebottom, by his will, dated the 9th of May, 1898, gave real estate on trust for sale, and directed that the proceeds should be handed over to the Ashton Infirmary when his executors should so decide.

The testator died in 1899. The executors sold a portion of the real estate but a large portion of it remained unsold when the time—one year from the death of the testator—allowed by section 5 of the Mortmain and Charitable Uses Act, 1891, was about to expire. Under orders of the court the time for sale was extended to the 26th of March, 1902: see In re Sidebottom, Beeley v. Sidebottom, [1901] 2 Ch. 1. 49 W. R. Dig. 21. The question was now raised whether, inasmuch as the subject-matter of the gift was personal estate arising from land, and so within the exception from the definition of land contained in section 3 of the Mortmain and Charitable Uses Act, 1891, section 5 of the Act was applicable, and whether it was not competent for the executors to retain the land unsold without obtaining the leave of the court.

Upon an originating summons issued by the trustees of the infirmary, the learned judge made an order declaring that sections 5 and 6 of the Act applied. And he extended the time for the sale of the real estate for six months, with a view to an appeal.

The trustees of the infirmary appealed.

Buckmaster, K.C., and Martelli, for the appellants.—This is not a devise of land to a charity. The charity is only interested in the proceeds of sale of land. But sections 5 and 6 of the Mortmain and Charitable Uses Act, 1891, can only refer to land as defined in that Act by section 3, and proceeds of sale of land are excepted from that definition.

They referred to In re Wilkinson, Esam v. Attorney-General, [1902] 1 Ch. 841.

Leigh-Clare, for the trustees of the will.

R. J. Parker, amicus curiæ, said that In re Wilkinson had been followed in several cases in chambers.

Romer, L.J., read the following judgment of the court: In this case land was assured by will to trustees upon a valid and effective trust for sale, and under the will the charity took no interest except in the proceeds of sale. It is not a case in which, according to the true construction of the will, land, or any "tenements or hereditaments, corporeal or incorporeal, of any tenure," was given directly to the charity or to trustees upon trust for the charity. So far as concerns any rents or profits derived from the land before sale, they would pass to the charity only by implication, as mixed with, and so as to be inseparable from, the proceeds of sale when the land was in fact sold. In these circumstances, having regard to section 3 of the Act of 1891, and to the object and intention of the Legislature as gathered from that Act as a whole, we have come to the conclusion that this is not a case in which land has been "assured by will to or for the benefit of any charitable uses" within the meaning of those words as used in section 5 of the Act, and, accordingly, that sections 5 and 6 of the Act have no application. No doubt by this will "land" was assured, and under the will the charity derived a "benefit." But by this will the charity obtained no benefit except a benefit in "the personal estate arising from the land" after the testator had affected the land with an effective trust for sale. This being so, in our opinion, as already stated, "land" within the definition of section 3 of the Act was not, as land, assured by will to or for the benefit of any charitable use. At the same time we desire to make it clear that this decision does not make it easy or possible for a charity to escape from the object of the Mortmain and Charitable Uses Act, 1888, as altered by the Act of 1891, so far as that object was directed to prevent charities holding land. In the present case, for example, in the events which have happened, the charity alone is interested in the proceeds of sale when the land is sold. But that fact will not justify the trustees, even by the direction or with the consent of the charity, in indefinitely postponing the sale and holding the land simply for the benefit of the charity. The trustees are still bound to carry out the trust for sale within a reasonable time from the death of the testator. The charity would have no right to revoke the trust for sale, or to authorize the trustees not duly or properly to carry out that trust. And we think that in any case in which it was made clear that, by express or tacit arrangement between trustees for sale and a charity, land was in fact being held unsold for an unreasonable time, it would be open to the Attorney-General to take action. It may be pointed out that the account rendered by trustees of a charity to the Charity Commissioners, pursuant to section 44 of the Charitable Trusts Amendment Act, 1855, ought to afford the means of ascertaining whether land is being so dealt with. In the present case we have not to consider how long it will be reasonable for the trustees not to sell the land. That question is not before us. But it may well be that, after the expiration of this time already allowed by the court for the postponement of the sale, the trustees will run considerable risk by postponing the sale unless they obtain the direction and authority of the court, not indeed under the provisions of section 5 of the Act of 1891, which have no application to the case, but under the general jurisdiction of the court as to trusts. We may add that the effect of our decision would seem to be that in a case like the present the provisions of section 8 of the Act of 1891 have no application to the land devised by the will unless the charity has money available to purchase land under the provisions of some other will. In the result we discharge the order appealed from, and declare that the provisions of sections 5 and 6 of the Act of 1891 do not apply to the land devised by this will.

tion the master shall allow all such costs, charges, and expenses as shall appear to him to have been necessary or proper for the attainment of justice or for defending the rights of any party."

Upon taxation of costs as between party and party the taxing-master allowed a sum of £12 12s. for the costs of the attendance of a country solicitor on the examination of a witness in London before the trial.

Held, that, under rule 10 of the Rules of January, 1902, the taxing-master had a discretion to allow this sum, though it exceeded the maximum authorized by the scale of fees in Appendix N, Item No. 147, to the R. S. C., 1883.

Appeal from a decision of Bigham, J., at chambers, refusing to review the taxation of costs.

The action was brought by the time charterers of a steamship to recover damages from the shipowners for negligence in allowing the steamship to start on a voyage without a sufficient quantity of coal on board whereby the steamship was obliged to deviate and put into a port where the charterers had to buy coal at an increased price. The action was set down for trial in the commercial list in London and an order was made for the examination of an important witness before the trial. The Liverpool solicitor who was acting for the plaintiffs, and who had drawn the proof for the examination of the witness by counsel, came to London and attended the examination. At the trial the plaintiffs recovered judgment. On the taxation of the costs the taxing-master allowed £12 12s. for the expenses of the Liverpool solicitor's attendance on the examination of the witness in London. The defendants carried in objections to the allowance on the ground that under item 147 in the scale in Appendix N to the Rules of the Supreme Court, 1883, only £2 2s. could be allowed as a maximum. The master, in answer to the objection, stated that in his discretion, as the witness was an important one, he had allowed £12 12s. Bigham, J., dismissed an application to review the taxation. The defendants appealed.

By rule 10 of the Rules of the Supreme Court, January, 1902, "Regulation 29 of ord. 65, r. 27, is hereby annulled, and the following regulation is substituted therefor: On every taxation the taxing-master shall allow all such costs, charges, and expenses as shall appear to him to have been necessary or proper for the attainment of justice or for defending the rights of any party, but save as against the party who incurred the same no costs shall be allowed which appear to the taxing-master to have been incurred or increased through over-caution, negligence, or mistake, or by payment of special fees to counsel, or special charges or expenses to witnesses or other persons, or by other unusual expenses.

Bailhache, for the defendants.—The taxing-master is bound by the scale of costs set out in Appendix N to the Rules of the Supreme Court, 1883. Item 147 in that scale only authorizes a maximum of £2 2s. for the attendance of a solicitor on the examination of a witness before an examiner where counsel is employed. The scale in Appendix N applies to taxation of costs as between solicitor and client and also as between party and party. Some of the items in the scale, however, could not formerly have been allowed as between party and party, and rule 10 of the Rules of the Supreme Court, January, 1902, was framed to enable the taxing-master to allow as between party and party those costs which he could under that scale allow when taxing as between solicitor and client. Rule 10 of January, 1902, only applies to taxation of costs as between party and party, and not to taxation as between solicitor and client. That rule has not affected or done away with the scale of costs in Appendix N. As between solicitor and client no more could have been allowed under the scale than £2 2s., unless the client had previously authorized a higher payment or had subsequently ratified it: In re Harrison, 34 W. R. 645, 33 Ch. D. 52. The master, therefore, could allow in this case the sum of £2 2s. If rule 10 of January, 1902, is held to apply to taxation of costs as between solicitor and client, the result will be that the scale will be gone, and the matter will be at large, and solicitors will have no guide for drawing up bills of costs. The true view is that the rule only applies to taxation as between party and party, and its effect is to make all the items in the scale apply equally to both kinds of taxation. The master was therefore wrong in allowing £12 12s. for the attendance of the country solicitor in London.

A. D. Bateson, for the plaintiffs, was not called upon.

MATHEW, L.J.—In this case both the taxing-master and the learned judge were of opinion that this question of allowing £12 12s. for the attendance of the Liverpool solicitor on the examination of the witness in London was a matter entirely within the discretion of the taxing-master. It has been argued before us that the taxing-master has no discretion to allow such a sum. I may say that, if this is a matter within the taxing-master's discretion, I can have no doubt that in this case the expenses of the attendance of the Liverpool solicitor upon the examination of the witness in London might be very properly allowed. It was most probably a reasonable course for the Liverpool solicitor, who was familiar with the facts of the case, to come to London for the purpose of being present at the examination of the witness. But it is said that the taxing-master has no discretion to allow this sum of £12 12s., and this raises a somewhat formidable point. The old practice upon taxation as between party and party was that the scale was binding on the taxing-master, and such an allowance as that of £12 12s. in the present case could not have been sanctioned. After careful consideration it was determined to alter that, and rule 10 of the rules of January, 1902, was framed, which provides that on every taxation the taxing-master shall allow all such costs, charges, and expenses as shall appear to him to have been necessary or proper for the attainment of justice or for defending the rights of any party. We are asked to interpret that rule by saying that it means in every taxation the taxing-master shall allow no higher costs than those prescribed by the scale. I decline so to read the rule. The rule was framed with full knowledge of the old regulations and scale, and the language is quite general, and authorizes the taxing-master to allow all such costs, &c., as shall appear to him necessary or proper for the attainment of justice. The master therefore had a discretion to allow this sum. The appeal must therefore be dismissed.

COZENS-HARDY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The argument is that rule 10 of the rules of January, 1902, was simply intended to bring party and party costs up to the then existing level of solicitor and client costs. In other words, the discretion of the taxing-master is limited within the four corners of the scale in Appendix N as applicable to taxation between solicitor and client. Upon the best consideration which I can give to the matter I have come to the conclusion that that argument cannot prevail. Rule 10 of the new rules is substituted for regulation 29 of ord. 65, r. 27. Regulation 29 was in somewhat similar terms, but was limited to party and party taxation. Rule 10 applies to every taxation, whether between party and party or between solicitor and client. Reading it thus, the necessary conclusion is, not that in every case of a country solicitor coming to London to attend the examination of a witness his costs are to be allowed, but that if the taxing-master on a review of all the circumstances thinks that it is necessary or proper for the attainment of justice that such a charge should be allowed, either as between party and party or as between solicitor and client, even though in the latter case no prior instructions were given by the client, nor was there any subsequent ratification by him, then the item ought to be allowed. The solicitor is bound to exercise his own judgment in the matter, subject to the right of the taxing-master to say whether he has exercised a right judgment. The taxing-master therefore had a discretion to allow this item of £12 12s., and that being so, it is not for us to say whether his discretion has been well exercised or not. At the same time, I think it right to say that I agree with my brother Mathew in thinking that the master's discretion has been well exercised.

Appeal dismissed.

Administration—Insolvent estate—Secured creditor—Withdrawal of claim—Certificate—Disallowance of claim—Realization of security—Leave to prove—Judicature Act, 1875 (38 & 39 Vict c. 77), s. 10—R. S. C., ord. 55, rr. 57, 70, 71.

By section 10 of the Judicature Act, 1875, the rules in bankruptcy are made applicable to the administration of insolvent estates in Chancery, so that a creditor is entitled to avail himself of any rights he may have under the rules in the absence of an established practice in Chancery to the contrary.

A secured creditor in an action in Chancery for the administration of an insolvent estate who, in reliance on his security, withdraws his claim, is not debarred from subsequently coming in and proving for the balance of his debt in accordance with the practice in bankruptcy by the mere fact that a certificate has been made in which his claim is stated to have been disallowed.

In re Hopkins, Williams v. Hopkins, 29 W. R. 767, 18 Ch. D. 370, distinguished.

This was an appeal from a decision of Swinfen Eady, J.

Edward McMurdo, the testator in the action, died in the year 1889, and on the 25th of July, 1889, an order was made in the action for the administration of the testator's estate. At the date of his death the testator was indebted to the New Oriental Bank to the amount of £47,198 14s. 10d., for which the bank held certain securities, including twelve debentures of the aggregate nominal value of £2,000 and 6,000 shares of an aggregate nominal value of £60,000 in the Delagoa Bay and East African Railway Co. (Limited).

On the 29th of March, 1890, the bank, in answer to advertisements for creditors of the estate, sent in notice of their claim, and received notice to come in and prove it on the 29th of May, 1891.

The railway and assets of the Delagoa Bay and East African Railway Co. (Limited) were seized by the Portuguese Government, and on the 13th of June, 1891, an arbitration tribunal was appointed.

On the 15th of June, 1891, the bank applied for and obtained an extension of the time for proving their claim, and subsequent extensions were also granted.

On the 23rd of June, 1892, the bank went into voluntary liquidation, and Thomas A. Welton was appointed liquidator.

On the 29th of October, 1892, the liquidator's solicitors wrote to the plaintiff's solicitors, that the liquidator had decided not to prove for the bank's claim, but to rely on the securities held by him for the debt.

On the 2nd of December, 1892, the liquidator attended in chambers and withdrew the claim.

On the 29th of November, 1893, the chief clerk made a certificate as to debts, in which he disallowed the claim of the bank. Notice of this disallowance was given to the liquidator.

The award in the Delagoa Bay arbitration was not made till the year 1900. In July of that year the liquidator received £1,448 in respect of his security, and there was evidence that nothing more would be paid.

In December, 1901, the liquidator took out a summons to be allowed to come in and prove for the balance of the bank's debt, notwithstanding that the time limited for making claims had expired.

On the 16th of December, 1901, this summons came before the master and was dismissed by him on the ground that the certificate was conclusive. No leave was given or asked for to amend the summons by making it also a summons to vary the certificate, but on the 20th of January, 1902, another summons was taken out by the liquidator that, notwithstanding the time for applying to vary had expired, the chief clerk's certificate dated the 29th of November, 1893, might be varied so far as the claim of the applicant was withdrawn or disallowed, and that, notwithstanding the time limited for making claims had expired, the applicant might be at liberty, under the judgment dated the 25th of July, 1889, in the action, to make and establish his claim as a creditor upon the testator's estate for the sum of £47,198 14s. 10d., together with interest thereon.

At the date of the issue of this summons the estate had not been distributed, but the master's final certificate in the action was made on the 27th of January, 1902.

The summons came on in chambers on the 10th of March, 1902, and was dismissed.

The liquidator moved to discharge the order dismissing the summons.

Swinfen Eady, J., dismissed the motion.

The liquidator appealed.

Muir Mackenzie and R. J. Parker, for the liquidator.—By virtue of section 10 of the Judicature Act, 1875, the rules in bankruptcy apply to the administration of insolvent estates in Chancery. The fact that a certificate has been made in the administration does not prevent the bankruptcy rules applying. Under the bankruptcy rules a creditor may come in and prove at any time so long as any assets remain undistributed. There is no distinction between unsecured and secured creditors, except that the latter before coming in to prove must deduct what has been realized on their security. The fact that a creditor has intimated that he is going to rely on his security does not prevent him from making his claim against the general estate,

(a.) Reported by J. I. STIRLING, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Upjohn, K.C., and Eastwick, contra.—Section 10 does not import the bankruptcy practice into Chancery administration. The real question is whether the applicant has brought himself within rules 70 and 71 of order 55. A claim can only be made after the expiration of the time fixed under rule 57 if no certificate has been made. If the claim has been the subject of a certificate the certificate is binding under rule 70, and will only be discharged or varied under rule 71 if the special circumstances of the case require it. Gillespie v. Alexander, 3 Russ. 130, is relied on in favour of the appellant, but the doctrine of that case has never been extended to a case in which a certificate has been made dealing with the very claim subsequently brought forward. To succeed the appellant must show special circumstances, but has failed to do anything of the kind.

Jenkins, K.C., and Whinney, in the same interest.

The following cases were referred to: Ex parte Boddam, 8 W. R. 457, 2 De G. F. & J. 625; Ex parte Good, 28 W. R. 553, 14 Ch. VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J., referred to the facts, and continued: Mr. Upjohn took the point that the question of the right of the applicants to come in now and prove had really been raised upon the summons heard and disposed of on the 16th of December, 1901, and that the result was that the question had now passed into a res judicata, and that the applicants had no longer any right to come to this court or any other court and have the question adjudicated on again. That objection primâ facie is a conclusive answer to this application. But it is an objection which can be got over if it is right and just so to do by extending the time for appealing against the order made on the 16th of December, 1901, and considering the very exceptional circumstances of this case it seems to us right that this extension of time for appealing should be allowed and that we should treat this appeal for some purposes as if it were an appeal from the order made on the 16th of December, 1901. When one bears in mind the great length of time that has occurred since the commencement of this administration without the fault of anyone one cannot be surprised that there was a slip made in procedure. That was really what happened, for when the summons came on to be heard on the 16th of December it was quite plain that both the applicants and the respondents to the summons intended to deal with the substantial question—aye or no, had the applicants, taking into consideration all the circumstances in the case, a right to come in and prove on proper terms being imposed? When that question was intended to be raised on the summons the objection was made that the old certificate stood, and that there was no application to vary it. In these circumstances I have very little doubt myself that if the hearing had been a hearing at which counsel were present an arrangement would have at once been made whereby either a fresh summons should be taken out or that summons treated as amended so as to include, if necessary, the application to vary the certificate. But that was not done. Nobody's rights have been affected or injured in any way by the time that has elapsed, and there being this substantial question raised between the parties it seems to us just that we should allow the extension of the time for appealing and deal with this matter now, and thus shut out in effect the objection that this question as to the right to prove has been disposed of, and is res judicata by reason of the order made on the 16th of December.

Having said that, I will now proceed to deal with the merits of the case. It really is not denied that in this case the 10th section of the Act of 1875 applies and that we must, if it makes any difference, deal with this question as it would be dealt with upon a proof being rendered in bankruptcy. I say if it makes any difference, because I am not at all sure myself that it makes any difference whatsoever. I will first deal with the matter as if the case were simply a case of a proof in bankruptcy. What were the circumstances of this case? The liquidator of the Oriental Bank Corporation was a secured creditor and he held as securities Delagoa Bay Railway bonds and some other securities the names of which are not material here. At the moment of the commencement of this administration it was very uncertain what the value of the Delagoa Bay Railway bonds might be. The question had been referred to arbitration as to what sum was to be paid by the Portuguese Government to the bondholders and the value of these securities necessarily depended upon this—one might almost call it—international arbitration. It was not known what sum might be awarded or how soon it might be awarded. In fact the arbitration occupied some eight years. It was not really for the interest of either the creditors of the estate or anybody else who was interested in the estate of Colonel McMurdo that the administration should take place without the value of these bonds being ascertained. In those circumstances the liquidator having made a claim, a certificate was made in which, to put it shortly, this claim was stated to be disallowed. At that moment the liquidator as creditor in the administration really was not, at all events according to the bankruptcy code, in a position to prove at all. He could not prove without realizing or valuing his security, and he had not done either one or the other, and therefore the claim was disallowed. No one suggests that this disallowance amounted to any adjudication upon the merits in respect of the right to prove. It was merely a declaration that rebus sic stantibus there was no right of proof. In those circumstances it does not seem to me that the liquidator allowed an unreasonable time to elapse after the award had been made before he applied for leave to prove.

Now according to my experience of bankruptcy practice there never has been any doubt as to the right of a creditor, whether he is a secured creditor or whether he is an unsecured creditor, to come in and prove at any time during the administration, provided only that he does not by his proof interfere with the prior distribution of the estate amongst the creditors, and subject always, in cases in which he has to come in and asked for leave to prove, to any terms which the court may think it just to impose; and of course in every case in which there has been a time limited for coming in to prove, although the lapse of that time without proof does not prevent the creditor from proving afterwards, subject to the conditions which I have mentioned, in every such case he can only come in and prove with the leave of the court. If that is so, leave must be granted upon such terms as the court may think just. That undoubtedly being the general rule, what is it that is said against it? It is said against it that by the first rule of the second schedule to the Bankruptcy Act of 1883, "every creditor shall prove his debt as soon as may be after the making of a receiving order," and it is suggested that the result of that rule is that if the creditor does not come in as soon as may be after the making of the receiving order, his right of proof is gone. Now, in answer to that there is first the section which Stirling, L.J., called attention to in the course of the argument—the 61st section of the Act: "Any creditor who has not proved his debt before the declaration of any dividend or dividends, shall be entitled to be paid out of any money for the time being in the hands of the trustee any dividend," &c., &c. Now, Mr. Jenkins seemed, to my mind, entirely unable to reconcile that section with the construction which he invited us to put upon the first rule of the second schedule. Moreover, if you take the rules with regard to proof in the second schedule as a whole, it is perfectly plain that the first rule of the second schedule cannot receive such a construction as is sought to be put upon it. It is a mere directory section, the non-compliance with which does not in any way deprive any creditor of a right or limit his right.

Now, the next point that was made is one that affects the proof whether it is looked at as a proof in bankruptcy or whether it is looked at as a proof under an administration in Chancery, and what he says is this: "Although it may be that there is a general rule that a creditor may come in and prove at any time provided he does not disturb prior distributions, and in some cases provided proper terms are imposed, yet all this is overridden because the creditor may subsequently to the commencement of the arbitration have so conducted himself as to estop himself from bringing in the proof."

It is said that he may have so acted as practically to have irrevocably agreed that he never will bring in a proof. I am not prepared to say that that is not a possible state of things, but the plain answer in this case is that although that may be theoretically possible there is not any ground whatsoever for saying that by words or by conduct the liquidator ever did agree, or did lead those who were interested in the administration to suppose that he agreed, that he would never carry in a proof.

Then it is suggested further that these securities while they were in the control of the creditor might have been dealt with by him, and at one time were of greater realizable value than they are now. I say nothing about the fact. I dare say that it is the truth, but it seems to me that it is impossible to say that because the securities have altered in value that that in any way estops the creditor from carrying in a proof here. I have not got to decide at the present moment, and I shall not express any opinion as to whether it is possible, when the proof is carried in, that in some way or other this altered value may not have to be taken into consideration; for the purpose of to-day I need not deal with that question.

I have now said all I have to say about the proof, looking at it as a proof in bankruptcy. Now let us look at it as a proof in an administration, and I shall really say very little upon this part of the case because my brethren are so much more competent to deal with it than I am, but I wish to say for myself that, having regard to the authorities that have been cited to us in reference to the practice in administrations, it seems to me that there is not the slightest ground for saying that the disallowance in a certificate like this of the claim to prove a disallowance which it is not suggested was based in any way upon an adjudication or any merits of any sort or kind, is a fact which interferes with the right to carry in a proof subsequently in the administration. It is quite true that the effect of the certificate is that the creditor not having come in within the time limited has no longer any right to the benefit of the order or decree without some subsequent order by the court, some supplementary certificate, and in effect, what is being asked for here is a supplementary certificate. I say again that upon the authorities that have been cited to us, including the authority of Lord Eldon in Gillespie v. Alexander, it is plain that the right to apply for leave to prove out of time is a right which has been recognized again and again in administrations. In those circumstances I really do not think that it makes very much difference whether one looks at this proof as if it were carried in in bankruptcy or carried in in the administration in Chancery. In either case it seems to me that by the machinery of what is in effect a supplementary certificate upon proper terms the court would allow the creditor to come in.

As to the other points that were raised, as to there being some estoppel, or some alteration in circumstances, which should prevent the creditor from proving now, the observations that I have made upon this subject with regard to the proof in bankruptcy apply equally to the proof in the administration. It seems to me that the whole argument to the contrary—the argument, I mean, which ought to treat the certificate as if it was something binding which prevented the liquidator from proving now—was based upon a misapprehension of what the certificate was intended to do. It should be remembered that primâ facie the object of the certificate is not to decide a question as to the rights of the creditor. Primâ facie the object of the certificate is to protect those who have to administer the estate. Of course there may be cases in which in truth and in fact merits have been adjudicated upon before the certificate is given, and in that case a supplementary certificate, I take it, would certainly be refused. But, according to my judgment, the view which seems to have been taken on the order of the 16th of December, 1901, that the certificate which was issued early in these proceedings raised some fatal objection to the proof of the creditor, an objection which could not be removed by a supplementary certificate, has no justification whatsoever in either theory or practice.

Now, there is only one other matter which I ought to mention, but there again I feel that the matter can be so much better dealt with by my brethren than by me owing to their greater familiarity with the Chancery practice, that I propose to put my view very shortly. Mr. Upjohn relied upon two rules in order 55. He said, as I understood him, that rule 57 only applied to causes arising before the actual certificate had been given, and then he said that that threw one upon rules 70 and 71; that the moment you had got the certificate it was binding upon all parties, and could only be got rid of by the exercise of the powers given to the judge under rule 71: "The judge may, if the special circumstances of the case require it, upon an application by motion or summons for the purpose, direct a certificate to be discharged or varied," &c., and then he said that in the present case there were no such special circumstances. It does seem to me that one need not really take any exception here to the argument of Mr. Upjohn upon this point, although I must not be taken as entirely agreeing with it, but I think one need not take any exception to it in the circumstances of this case, for if it be true that under rule 71 there must be special circumstances, and that this certificate, which really adjudicated upon nothing whatsoever, is binding upon the creditor just as if it had been an adjudication in substance. If all that is true—I do not know whether it is true, yet we have the special circumstances here, and we have got them by reason of what Romer, L.J., called attention to in the course of the argument, because you have got a state of things where by the lapse of time it would be right to exercise the powers under rule 57, and that itself is a state of circumstances which falls in with the words "special circumstances." In these circumstances the view we take is that the leave ought now to be given as asked for in this summons of the 14th of January, it being taken that by our order the time for appealing against the order of the 16th of December, 1901, is extended, and that this summons is dealt with as if framed upon such an extension of time for appealing.

In those circumstances the only question that has to be dealt with is the question of terms. With regard to that question of terms, I do not mean at the present moment to say anything final, because it seems to me that to a very large extent these terms can be, and ought to be, dealt with when the claim is carried in. I do not define the terms so far as we have to impose them at the present moment, because this will be much more satisfactorily done after my brothers have given their judgments, so that at present my judgment only is that the leave ought to be given upon proper terms, and the proper terms will be dealt with after my brethren have given their judgment.

ROMER, L.J.—I also think that on terms the appellant should be allowed here to come in and prove. I will first consider what took place in the early days of the proceedings in this administration action. The appellants intimated their intention to prove their debt for its full amount. They were then required by the administrator (the creditor having the conduct of the proceedings) to prove their debt. They then had to consider their position having regard to the fact that the estate was insolvent and that they held securities. Now what ensued appears to me to be in substance this. The appellants found what was obvious, that in accordance with the Bankruptcy Rules which applied to this case they could not come in and prove without valuing their security; and at that time they appear to me to have come to the conclusion that their security was equal to or greater in value than the amount of their debt, and thereupon they announced their intention of not proving and withdrawing their claim to prove. That was assented to, and then before the master their claim was, as it is said, disallowed. When the certificate came to be made by the master he entered in the certificate this claim as having been made and having been disallowed. We now therefore know what the meaning of the word "disallowed" is in this certificate. It means what I have stated and no more. It does not amount to an adjudication on the question of debt or no debt. It is not a matter of adjudication in the true sense. This is not a case of res judicata being pleadable as against the appellant—indeed it is not contended on behalf of the respondents that the appellant is estopped upon that ground.

Then if he is not prevented from asking for leave to prove on that ground, I next will consider whether his then determination not to prove because of what he then considered to be the value of his security was to be taken as against him as final and irrevocable, so that when he subsequently found that his security did not realize what he had hoped it would and did not suffice nearly to pay his debt he should be held debarred from all opportunity under that change of circumstances from coming in and proving for the balance of his debt. I think that what then took place could not be held to so prevent him. To my mind it was a mere case of a secured creditor resolving not to prove because at the time he valued his security as equal to or greater than the amount of his debt, and at that time he probably did not contemplate that there would be any necessity at any time thereafter for his having to come in and prove because of any possible change in the value of the security or in the amount it would realize. But that is a very different thing from saying that he must be thereby taken to have resolved and elected never to come in and attempt to prove even if it should turn out that contrary to his anticipation the property realized less than the amount of his debt. It seems to me that we cannot, and ought not to draw such a conclusion from his acts on that occasion.

That being so, I pause to consider whether upon any other ground he ought to be estopped by his then determination of withdrawing his proof from coming forward now in the existing circumstances and asking to be allowed to prove. I think not, for I wish to point out that this was not a case of a bargain between the administrator and the creditor. It was not anything in the nature of a contract express or implied whereby the creditor withdrew his proof on the terms of retaining his security—nothing of the sort. He simply did not prove for the reason I have stated, and for no other reason, and the rights of the parties remained wholly unchanged by what he then did for, as I pointed out in the course of the argument, the administrator could at any time have redeemed on paying the amount of the debt. Had the value of the assets gone up even beyond the then expectation of the creditor, the administrator at any time could have come forward and called on him to hand over all the securities on being paid the amount of his debt.

That being so I will treat this in the first place as if it had been a case of bankruptcy pure and simple. To my mind, having regard to the second schedule to the Bankruptcy Act of 1883, the Legislature clearly contemplated the right of a creditor on any alteration during the bankruptcy in the value of his security by realization of that security or otherwise to be allowed to readjust his claim—of course by so doing not thereby creating any injustice to the other parties, and of course not interfering with anything that had been done as to dividend or otherwise prior to the change of proof. And apart from any other sufficient circumstances justifying the Court of Bankruptcy, in a case like the present somewhat special circumstances, it could not be said that merely because the creditor had originally valued his security as being greater than his debt or equal to it he was thereby for ever prevented coming in and proving when it turned out by realization or otherwise that his security was insufficient to pay his debt. Of course the Court of Bankruptcy would have had power to impose terms, if terms had been necessary, and, of course, he would not have been allowed to disturb, as I have said, any prior dividends in the bankruptcy; but, in such a case, as I have indicated, in the absence of any special circumstances, which would render it unjust to allow the creditor to come in, he would have been allowed in bankruptcy, and ought to have been allowed in bankruptcy to come in; and the bankruptcy practice would clearly have allowed him to do so. As a general rule, he could have come in, of course, such terms being imposed as might, to the court, under any special circumstances, have appeared just. It is said that rule 1 of the second schedule would have stopped the creditor in such a case, from coming in and proving. That rule, to my mind, has not such a hard and fast effect as the respondents here would seek to attribute to it. That rule must be read with the other rules. Rule 1 is a very general rule. It applies to all creditors, and, of course, was not dealing with the secured creditors more than it was with any other creditor, and clearly no one could reasonably contend that, by reason of rule 1 of that second schedule, an ordinary creditor by mere delay in coming in and proving his debt would thereby altogether lose his right of coming in at all as against undistributed assets in a case where otherwise no injustice would be done. As a rule no injustice is done when a creditor comes in for the Bankruptcy Court can always impose terms which will prevent any unnecessary delay in the administration of the estate in bankruptcy being caused by the lateness of the creditor coming in, and of course the court could make such terms as would be right as to the creditor coming in not disturbing prior dividends or otherwise. As a rule, subject, as I have said, to care being taken that no injustice is done, by special order the Court of Bankruptcy will undoubtedly, notwithstanding rule 1, allow a creditor, notwithstanding his delay, to come in and prove and share in undistributed assets. I will not say that there may not be special circumstances that might justify the Bankruptcy Court in refusing to admit a creditor who came in late, but I have stated what I conceive to be the general rule and practice of the Bankruptcy Court.

Now are there any special circumstances in this immediate case which would have justified the Bankruptcy Court—and as far as I am dealing with this part of the case the same meaning applies to the application though it is made in Chancery—in saying to the creditor, "You ought not to come in and prove at all." I think not.

In the first place, as to the delay. No doubt there has been considerable delay; but this is a very peculiar case. The principal securities consisted of debentures and shares in the Delagoa Bay Railway. That railway, as we know, was seized by the Portuguese Government, and a fund was found by the Portuguese Government; and the parties entitled to share in it had to be ascertained by arbitration. What the secured creditor, the appellant here, did was this: He waited the result of the arbitration; he waited to see what sum would be awarded to him in respect of his holdings in the railway under the award of the arbitrator. Was that an unreasonable course for him to take? I think not. Was it a course which a mortgagee, acting reasonably and properly, would be entitled to take? I think it was, and, indeed, curiously enough, in this very case the very same course has been adopted, and I think rightly so, by the administrator in this very action, acting, of course, under the direction of the court. For part of the assets of the testator in this case were holdings in this very railway, and we have been told, and I have no doubt accurately, that the delay that has arisen in winding up this estate is partly, if not chiefly, due to the fact that the award had to be waited for, and the funds awarded in respect of the testator's holding in the railway had to be sent over here before the estate could be finally wound up.

In those circumstances can it be said that, by reason of the delay, the appellant ought not to be allowed to come forward now, when the funds in court have not been distributed, and ask that he, as a creditor who has not been paid by his security, should be allowed to share as against the undistributed balance? I think not, assuming always that care is taken by terms not to allow the winding up of this estate to be further delayed by reason of the delay in the appellant making his present application for leave to prove. If the appellant is allowed to come in and prove no injustice will be done. There has been no change of parties, which would have rendered it unfair to allow the appellant to come in and prove. The only thing that can be said which would require the court's attention in dealing with the matter specially is this, as I have said, the question of the delay of the appellant not leading to further delay in the administration of the estate; and that can be properly guarded against.

Now, there was one other point taken on behalf of the respondents here which must be alluded to, though I do not think it amounted to the essence of the case. It was said that the liquidator, the representative of the applicants, had other securities besides the securities of the Delagoa Bay Railway to which I have referred; and it is said, on behalf of the respondents, that one of those securities, consisting of shares, might have been sold at some time during the administration for some substantial sum. That is the only case made in respect to those other securities. The appellant has not thought it necessary to deal specifically with that allegation on behalf of the respondents. No doubt, of course, if those securities have realized anything, if they are not now valueless, the appellant on being allowed to come in and prove must give a proper account of those securities, and either value them, or if they are valueless state that they are valueless, and offer to give them up; but the mere fact that the secured creditor as mortgagee might possibly have sold some shares ought not to be in itself fatal to him on this application. A mortgagee holding shares is not bound, as mortgagee, to be looking about for every turn of the market to see whether he can sell, nor is he bound to sell at the highest price the market can give. I can see no sufficient reason myself, in many a case, why a mortgagee of shares should not be acting prudently and rightly in not attempting to sell the shares, but in trying to realize moneys in respect of them by dividends or otherwise; and certainly I do not think a case is made against a mortgagee fatal to him in a case like the present by merely stating that he had, as security, some shares, and possibly might have sold them at a value during the period which elapsed before he desired to prove.

I do not think, therefore, that on this part of the case, the respondents have made a sufficient case to justify us in peremptorily refusing to allow the appellant to come in and prove. That deals with practically the whole of what I may call the special circumstances in this case, which are said to render it unjust to allow the appellant to come in and prove now; and I have pointed out, I think, why I think there are no such circumstances as would enable us to say, on the merits, that the applicant ought not to prove.

But now I come to a contention which, to a great extent, is a technical objection, and may be said to be almost the principal objection taken on behalf of the respondents. It is said that this is not an administration in bankruptcy, and it is said that the applicants here are in a very much worse position because it is an administration in the Chancery Division, and a certificate has been made. To my mind, that is not in any way fatal to the appellant. Section 10 of the Judicature Act of 1875 undoubtedly applies to this case. I do not say that that has done away with the Chancery practice in an administration action, or that, for the purposes of the present case, we are to treat the bankruptcy practice as incorporated with or overruling the Chancery practice. Nothing of the kind; but section 10, all the same, applies, and, so far as it is consistent with the Chancery practice, the bankruptcy rules apply, and ought to be applied; and if this secured creditor in bankruptcy would have been allowed to come in and prove, to my mind he ought to be allowed to come in in the Chancery administration, the estate being insolvent, unless there is some Chancery practice which prevents it.

Is there any Chancery practice which prevents it? Is it prevented by the certificate? Not so. I have pointed out, so far as the certificate is concerned, what its effect and meaning is, and what in particular the word "disallow" means in this certificate; and on the general question I wish to point out that, according to Chancery practice, a creditor, after a certificate has been made as to debts, and notwithstanding the certificate is, as a rule, allowed to come in when there are assets undistributed and share in the administration of those assets, of course in each case on such terms as to the court seems just; and I think the appellant ought to be allowed to come in on such terms as I have already indicated. There is no difficulty in the present case. In the first place it appears to me that the certificate here, having regard to what we now know to be the meaning of the word "disallow," need not even be varied. I think it would be quite sufficient to say that the creditor should be allowed to come in and prove, notwithstanding the certificate; but, even if it had been formally necessary here to vary the certificate, I should still have felt no difficulty, for under ord. 55, r. 71, I certainly am of opinion that there would have been special circumstances which would have bound the court in justice to vary the certificate—of course, taking care always to cause no injustice in the way I have previously referred to. That disposes of this case. I need not go through the authorities. The only one I need say a word upon is In re Hopkins. That case, to my mind, is clearly distinguishable, and does not apply to the present case. In In re Hopkins, under the Bankruptcy Act and rules then applying, the creditor who, in that case, wished to come in and change his proof could not have amended his proof in bankruptcy, and would not have been allowed to do so; and when he came and was obliged to confess that, in bankruptcy, he could not have been allowed to change his proof, he was met by the unanswerable objection in Chancery: "Where are your special circumstances? There is no special circumstance, and the Bankruptcy Rules," as they then stood, "are against you"; and, accordingly, it was held that, not being allowed to change his proof in bankruptcy, and there being no special circumstances entitling the court to allow him to amend the certificate, he could not alter his proof in Chancery. That is the whole case, and it is clearly no authority on the case now before us. With regard to the application made to the master by the appellant that occasioned some little difficulty in my mind at first; but when I look at the peculiar circumstances of this case, I have also come to the conclusion that what then took place was a slip in practice, and, that, under the circumstances, it ought not to be held fatal to the appellant. I think that what my lord has pointed out is the proper course to be adopted—namely, to extend the time in which to appeal from the decision of the master in that case; to treat the present application as amended in that respect, and thus to give the court necessary jurisdiction to make the proper order which I think ought to be made here.

The result will be that the appellant should be allowed, notwithstanding the certificate, to come and prove. The terms with regard to detail will be mentioned in a moment.

STIRLING, L.J.—I have arrived at the same conclusion as my brethren, and after what they have said there is very little for me to add. I should like, however, to say a few words on the point which was mainly urged before us yesterday, and which, as I read the judgment, was adopted by the learned judge as the ground of his decision in the court below. The arguments and the judgment, as I conceive, have rested upon ord. 55, r. 70, which provides, reading it shortly, that every certificate shall be transmitted to the Central Office to be there filed, and shall thenceforth be binding on all the parties to the proceedings unless discharged or varied upon application by summons. A certificate has been made in the present case by which the claim of the present appellant was disallowed. It is said that that certificate is binding. And that is quite correct. It is binding, but what is the meaning of "binding"? The contention is that it is binding in this sense, that the creditor is thereby precluded from again bringing forward the claim notwithstanding any changes in the circumstances which have occurred since that certificate was made. Now, undoubtedly, the certificate might be a complete bar to the creditor. If, for example, the debt had been contested and it had been adjudicated before the master at the time when he made his certificate that either the debt did not exist or that it had been satisfied. I conceive that adjudication, not having been set aside within the proper time, would be a complete bar to the claim being brought forward. But it seems to me that we are entitled to go behind the certificate to this extent to ascertain the circumstances in which the disallowance took place.

Now when that is done it is clear upon the evidence that the claim, being originally brought in in answer to an advertisement issued under the direction of the court, the appellant when called upon to prove his debt thought fit to withdraw the claim, relying as he said upon the securities he held. There was therefore, and this indeed was not disputed at the bar, no adjudication whatever upon the debt itself. Res judicata could not be pleaded by any party to the proceedings. It seems to me that all that was meant by the certificate is this, that the claim was disallowed because in the circumstances existing at the date of the certificate the claim was inadmissible, the creditor electing to rely on his security. If, then, the circumstances have so altered that the creditor might legally bring forward the claim at the present time, it appears to me that the certificate ought not to prevent him from so doing, and in my judgment the case of In re Metcalfe is an authority for that proposition. It does not in its circumstances govern the present case, but it is an authority to this effect that, notwithstanding a certificate in which a claim is allowed at a certain amount a further claim may be brought in without that certificate being varied. There a claim was made for a sum of £525, being principal £500 and £25 interest, and the certificate found that that was the amount due to the creditor. The creditor afterwards discovered from documents which came to his knowledge that the amount of interest which was allowed from the estate of the deceased was too small, and he applied to be allowed to prove for the additional interest which had not been allowed, and the Court of Appeal allowed the claim. James, L.J., who gave the judgment of the court, said that the case could not be distinguished from the ordinary case of a creditor coming in after a lapse of time, and he said that the interest in question had never been the subject of decision; that they were not reviewing any decision; it was merely a question of carrying in a claim for an amount which the applicant by mistake had omitted previously to claim. It appears to me that the Court of Appeal there considered that the procedure which is authorized by rule 57 of order 55 was applicable, and that upon a simple application by summons without any variation of the certificate a claim might be received if the judge was satisfied that it was just, but upon such terms and conditions as to costs and otherwise as the judge might think fit.

Now, the question whether in the present case the creditor ought to be admitted appears to me to depend upon the rules which prevail in bankruptcy at the p[illegible] which are made applicable to admiss[illegible] case as this by section [illegible] 1875. With referer[illegible] he creditor would in bankruptcy be entitled to come in. He might, as it seems to me, come in in two ways, either because he is a secured creditor who has realized his security, and is, therefore, entitled to come in under rule 9 of the second schedule of the Act, or it may be that he ought to be treated as a creditor who has valued his security as equal to the amount of his debt, and in that case the provisions of rule 13 of the same schedule would be applicable, and would enable him in the changed circumstances to come in and prove in bankruptcy. It appears to me that the case of In re Hopkins, which was referred to, cannot govern the present case, because in that case, as has already been pointed out, the rules which were in force in bankruptcy at the time when that case was decided were different from those which now exist and precluded the creditor from bringing in any such claim as is now brought forward here.

I agree with what has been said by the other members of the court on the various points which I do not think it is necessary for me to enter into in detail, and on the whole I come to the conclusion that this appeal should be allowed on proper terms.

Appeal allowed.

In re CARROLL.
BRICE v. CARROLL. (a.)

Practice—Solicitor—Officer of court—Loan of trust money—Jurisdiction—Summary order.

A solicitor's clerk who was trustee under the will of A. lent trust moneys belonging to A.'s estate to his employer, the solicitor, who was aware that the money belonged to the trust. Notice for the payment up of the money was given to the solicitor, but the money was not received. In an action for the administration of A.'s estate,

Held, that the court, in exercise of its jurisdiction over its officers, had power, on motion in the action, to order the solicitor, although he was not a party to the action, to bring the money into court.

MOTION.

The plaintiffs, Emma Brice and E. Vale, in this case were two of the legatees under the will of Elizabeth Carroll, who died in 1894. The sole executor of the will was P. Carroll.

The plaintiffs claimed payment of the legacies, administration of the estate, and that the executor (who was the present defendant) should bring into court all the moneys in his hands belonging to the estate.

The defendant was a clerk in the employ of Mr. de Mortimer-McIntosh, a solicitor. An order for an account was made against the defendant on the 25th of February. The defendant filed his accounts on the 7th of April, and from his affidavit it appeared that the net residuary estate of the testatrix available for the payment of legacies amounted to £902 9s. 9d. Of this the sum of £450 4s. 10d., which represented the legacies in question, had been lent by the defendant to his employer, Mr. de Mortimer-McIntosh at 4 per cent. interest without any security, but subject to six months' notice. Notice had been served on Mr. McIntosh in August last, but the money had not been paid up.

The court was moved on the 28th of April by the plaintiff for an order on the defendant Carroll to pay the legacies into court, but the motion was refused on the ground that the money was not in his hands.

The plaintiffs then served Mr. McIntosh with notice of motion for an order to bring the money into court.

An affidavit was filed by Mr. McIntosh admitting receipt of the loan from defendant with notice that it was trust money, and stating that it would be repaid in due course, but objecting that the court had no jurisdiction to make an order on him in an action to which he was not a party.

Sheldon, for plaintiffs.—The solicitor is an officer of the court, and the court in exercise of its jurisdiction over its own officers can give summary relief and not compel the trustee to sue the solicitor: In re Clerihew, 19 W. R. 939; Staniar v. Evans, 35 W. R. 286, 24 Ch. D. 470.

Muir Mackenzie, for de Mortimer-McIntosh.

FARWELL, J.—This is a very bad case. The only defence to the present application is that this court has no jurisdiction to make the order. The two cases cited are, however, in my opinion, sufficient authority for making a summary order. I adopt the language of James, L J., in In re Clerihew, where he says "it would be a shocking thing if this order could not be made." Mr. McIntosh must bring the money into court within fourteen days and pay the costs of this motion.

Order accordingly.

BAXENDALE v. NORTH LAMBETH LIBERAL AND RADICAL CLUB. (a.)

Right of way—Licensees of grantee—Reasonable user.

A grant of a right of way to premises which may lawfully be used for a given purpose authorizes the use of the way in question in any reasonable manner by all persons lawfully going to or from such premises in pursuance of such purpose, whether such persons be mentioned in the grant or not.

This was an action by the lessee of a house in Wincott-street, Kennington-road, against the defendant club (a society registered under the Industrial and Provident Societies Act, 1893, 56 & 57 Vict. c. 39) and one of its members, claiming an injunction to restrain the members, honorary members, guests, visitors, officers, and tradespeople of the defendant club from using as a carriage or footway a passage across the lands included in the plaintiff's lease.

The passage led from Wincott-street through an archway under the house above-mentioned, first to a yard and workshops in rear of the said house, and then to the buildings of the defendant club.

It was at the time of action used as the sole entrance to the club buildings.

The club had a large number of members, each of whom was entitled to introduce a guest, and all associates of the Working Men's Club and Institute

(a.) Reported by J. H. DAVIES, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

(a.) Reported by C. B. CAMM, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Union (Limited) were entitled to the use of the clubhouse.

A right of way over the passage was claimed by the defendant club under a lease made to the defendant club's predecessor in title by the then common owner of the house in Wincott-street and of the site of the club. This was a grant of "a full and free right and liberty for the lessee, his executors, administrators, and assigns, undertenants, and servants, from time to time and at all times hereafter, at his or their will and pleasure, for all purposes connected with the use and enjoyment of the said premises to go, return, pass, and repass in, along, and over" the said passage. The underlease contemplated further buildings on the demised land, and there was nothing in it to prohibit the use of the land for the purposes of a workmen's club.

The plaintiff contended, inter alia, that the members, honorary members, guests, officers, and tradespeople of the defendant club were mere licensees, and as such were not within the terms of the above grant.

Eve, K.C., and Leverson, for the plaintiff.—The grant is confined to the lessee, his executors, administrators, and assigns, undertenants, and servants. Neither the members, nor the guests, nor the officers, nor the tradespeople of the defendant club come within any of these designations. Grants intended to include such licensees of the grantee are in a wider form. Thus conveyancing precedents mention: "Friends," Bythewood & Jarman (4th ed.), p. 604; "visitors," 2 Davidson, Part I., p. 527, 1 Key & Elphinstone (7th ed.), p. 738; "agents and workmen," 1 Key & Elphinstone, p. 838; "persons authorized" by the grantee, 3 Bythewood & Jarman, p. 572, 1 Prideaux (18th ed.), p. 387; and "other persons and person for the benefit and advantage of" the grantee, 2 Davidson, Part I., p. 266, 5 Bythewood & Jarman, p. 543. In any case, the user of the right of way must be reasonable: 5 Davidson, Part I., p. 144; and Hawkins v. Carbines, 27 L. J. Ex. 44, 6 W. R. C. L. Dig. 102.

Vernon Smith, K.C., and Howland Jackson, for the defendants.—The way may be used by any person entitled to go the dominant tenement: Cannon v. Villars, 26 W. R. 751, 8 Ch. D. 415. It is in fact only used for the reasonable purposes of the club. In Metcalfe v. Westaway, 13 W. R. 181, 34 L. J. C. P. 113, the words "assigns, officers, servants, and workmen" were held to include licensees.

Eve, K.C., in reply.

Cur. adv. vult.

SWINFEN EADY, J.—It is contended that the right of way extends only to the grantee and his tenants and servants, and does not include the members of the club, who number some 374, and honorary members, who number very many more, and that there is no authority for holding that a grant of a right of way extends to all licensees of the grantee.

I am of opinion that the grant of a right of way to premises which may be lawfully used as a workmen's club extends to all persons lawfully going to and from the club, and includes the members of the club, associates, tradespeople, and servants. Reliance was placed on the fact that in certain precedents "visitors" and "persons authorized" are expressly mentioned, but it cannot be doubted that in the ordinary case of a grant of a right of way to a house which may be used as a private dwelling-house, the right would extend not only to the grantee but to members of his family, servants, visitors, guests, and tradespeople, even though none of these persons might be expressly mentioned in the grant. At the time of this grant the passage in question was adapted for and was capable of being used by carts and carriages, and the necessary or reasonable user of the premises as a club requires that there should be liberty of passing over the passage in question for the persons and vehicles shown to have used it: see Cannon v. Villars. The result of the evidence is that the defendants are only using their premises in a usual and ordinary manner within their legal rights, and that the passage is only used in a reasonable manner having regard to the lawful existence of the club. The action fails and must be dismissed with costs.

SMITH v. MAYOR AND ALDERMEN OF THE BOROUGH OF SOUTHAMPTON. (a.)

Local government—Rating—Right of appeal—Charges incurred more than six months before rate—Right of appeal—Public Health Act, 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 55), ss. 210, 218.

A ratepayer applied to quash a rate on the ground that it included expenditure more than six months before the striking of the rate, contrary to section 210 of the Public Health Act, 1875.

Held, that a primâ facie right of appeal lay, and that it had not been taken away by section 218 of the Act.

This was an appeal against the decision of the Recorder of Southampton quashing a rate on the ground that it included certain charges which had been incurred and become due more than six months before the rate contrary to the provisions of section 210 of the Public Health Act, 1875.

The special case set out the following facts: The respondent was a ratepayer living at Shirley, which up to 1885 formed no part of the county of Southampton, but which was added to the borough by virtue of a provisional order of the Local Government Board made pursuant to sections 58 and 59 of the Local Government Act, 1888, and dated the 30th of May, 1895. The order was confirmed by the Provisional Order Confirmation Act, No. 16, 1895, and came into force on the 9th of November, 1895. The corporation, acting as the urban sanitary authority, madea general district rate to enable them to defray expenses incurred or to be incurred for the period commencing the 1st day of April, 1901, and ending the 31st day of March, 1902.

The corporation, before proceeding to make the rate pursuant to section 218 of the Public Health Act, 1875, caused an estimate of the rate to be made, and the estimate was on the 22nd day of May, 1901, approved by them. And the estimate was duly entered in the rate book, which contains the rate made on the 12th of June, 1901, and open to public inspection during office hours thereat.

The respondent appealed against the rate on the ground above stated.

The recorder held that certain items in that estimate were for charges incurred more than six months before the making of the rate, and though they did not come within any of the exceptions to the general rule, that a retrospective rate was bad.

(a.) Reported by C. G. WILBRAHAM, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Macmorran, K.C. (Emmanuel with him)—No appeal lies against this estimate. By section 218 of the Act the estimate made of the rate "shall forthwith, after being approved by the urban authority, be entered in the rate book. . . . but it shall not be deemed part of the rate, nor in any respect affect the validity of the same." That section applies in this case.

Foote, K.C. (Forder Lampard with him).—The words of that section were not intended to take away the general right of appeal against a rate: Reg. v. Worksop Local Board of Health, 13 W. R. 253, 5 B. & S. 951.

Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J.—The questions raised in this case are of course important, and to a certain extent difficult, but they have been most clearly explained to us by Mr. Macmorran in his argument. I think I had better, before I deal with the facts, say a word or two upon the law as I understand it applicable to this case.

By section 210 of the Public Health Act, 1875, the general district rate, which forms part of the general district fund when it is collected, is to be levied in order to raise money for the payment of future charges and expenses incurred at any time within six months before the making of the rate. In calculating the period during which the rate may be made retrospectively the time during which any appeal or other proceeding relating to such rate is pending shall be excluded. Therefore there is an express statutory prohibition, and a very distinct one, against allowing retrospective payments to be included beyond the period of six months, and all the more so because money may be raised by a rate to make a payment retrospectively for a certain period. Therefore it obviously seems to be a matter of importance, and they have met the difficulty which corporations or public bodies would have in making these payments by fixing the period of six months. Then there is the general right of appeal under section 269, and notwithstanding all that has been urged before us by Mr. Macmorran. I think it would be extremely difficult to say that primâ facie this was not a right of appeal in respect of a rate that was levied and purported to be levied in respect of charges which were not authorized by section 210. It was expressly decided in the Worksop case in 1887 that there was. Now at that time the concluding words of section 218 with regard to the operation of the estimate were not in the existing statute. It is contended before us that as to the old provision with regard to the making of the rate there are added the words, the estimate shall not be deemed part of the rate nor in any respect affect the validity of the same, a person has not a right of appeal in respect of a matter alleging that the rate includes the payment of a charge more than six months old. I think that it would require very much more than that to take the existing right of appeal away, which I think was clearly given, and I do not think that the addition of the words, though I agree probably they were added in consequence of the decision in the case of Reg. v. Worksop Local Board of Health, are sufficient to do so. It is not necessary for us to decide what is the full effect of those words. I should think that they would be sufficient to prevent a person being allowed to rely upon any defect in the estimate or a particular way in which the estimate was made, or possibly to prevent him marshalling the items in an estimate. According to his contention the estimate so construed would indicate the payment of a debt more than six months old, but I cannot think it ever could have been intended that, if upon the facts before the magistrates before the sessions on appeal it is established that there is a payment which will be made out of the moneys to be raised by the rate levied more than six months' old, the right of appeal is not given, and I do not myself think it means that you may not look at the estimate for the purpose of ascertaining the facts. Of course, I can quite imagine it is open to the corporation to say, and the court would receive all evidence to show that the estimate does not show the true state of facts, but to say that nobody may look at the estimate for the purpose of raising a primâ facie case is, I think, going very much too far. When we come to look at the facts there really does not seem any reasonable doubt.

GREAT NORTHERN AND CITY RAILWAY CO. v. TILLETT. (a.)

Railway—Lands Clauses Compensation Act, 1845 (8 & 9 Vict. c. 18), s. 121—Tenant from year to year—Jurisdiction of magistrate—Possession.

The justices, where a claim has been made for compensation under the Lands Clauses Compensation Act, have no power to inquire into the claimant's title, but it is a condition precedent to any claim that the claimant shall have been required to give up possession of lands occupied by him.

Case stated by Sir Horatio Davies, K.C., M.P., an alderman of the City of London.

The following facts appeared on the special case.

The respondent James Tillett, with Frank Yeoman and Clement Andrews, carried on the business of auctioneers, 32, Finsbury-pavement, and held a lease of a portion of the basement there which expired the 25th of December, 1899, but the respondent Yeoman remained in possession after that date.

Notice to treat was served by the railway company (the appellants in this case) on the 12th of June, 1899, on the superior landlord, one M. J. Jervoise, and on the 14th of June, 1899, on the respondent. In March, 1900, the respondent went out of possession but retained the keys.

On the 1st of January, 1901, the superior landlord assigned to the appellants his lease of 32, Finsbury-pavement, under section 121 of the Lands Clauses Compensation Act, 1845. The case was heard before the alderman (who has the authority in law of two justices), and the appellants then contended that the alderman had no jurisdiction—(1) as the premises in respect of which compensation was sought was not in the possession of the respondent within the meaning of the section; (2) that the respondent was not on the facts within section 121, or entitled to issue the summons, or claim to have compensation assessed; but the agreement for the sale of the lease was stated to be subject to the rights, if any, of Messrs. Tillett and Yeoman, and recited an alleged underlease dated the 6th of March, 1900, from M. J. Jervoise to Tillett and

(a.) Reported by C. G. WILBRAHAM, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Yeoman, the validity of which was disputed by the appellants.

On the 22nd of February the appellants began to pull down the premises.

On the 29th of August, 1901, the respondent, as receiver of the business of Messrs. Tillett & Yeoman, put in a claim for £560 on the basis of a tenancy from year to year of the portion of the basement at 32, Finsbury-pavement.

The alderman decided in favour of the respondent on the ground that the respondent could only get compensation assessed under section 121, and on the authority of Reg. v. Kennedy, 41 W. R. 380, 57 J. P. 346; Bexley Heath Railway v. Colonel North, 58 J. P. 832, 43 W. R. Dig. 93.

Section 121 of the Act of 1845 provides with regard to lands subject to leases, "that if any such lands shall be in possession of any person having no greater interest therein than as a tenant from year to year, and if such person be required to give up possession of any lands so occupied by him before the expiration of his term or interest therein he shall be entitled to compensation for the value of his unexpired term or interest in such lands, . . . and the amount of such compensation shall be determined by two justices in case the parties differ about the same. . . ."

E. W. Hansell.—The respondent was not entitled to take any compensation under section 121. The only claim he alleges is under an underlease dated the 6th of March, 1900, and no claim as against the railway company can be created after the notice to treat: Ex parte Edwards, 19 W. R. 1047, L. R. 12 Eq. 389. In the second place the respondents were not in possession, and that is a condition precedent to their claim: Reg. v. Stone, 14 W. R. 791, L. R. 1 Q. B. 529.

Paul Goff, for the respondent.—The question of title is not for the justices; their duty is only to assess the compensation: Reg. v. London and North-Western Railway, 3 E. & B. 443, 2 W. R. C. L. Dig. 166. If the magistrate had not given us compensation we had no other remedy: Reg. v. Manchester, Sheffield, and Lincolnshire Railway, 2 W. R. 591, 4 E. & B. 88. The railway company have struck too soon; they should have waited for the award to be sued upon.

Cur. adv. vult.

The judgment of the court was delivered by Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J.—This was a case stated by an alderman of the City of London on an application made to him to assess compensation under section 121 of the Lands Clauses Act. That section requires that the amount of compensation payable to persons who have no greater interests than as tenant for a year or from year to year shall be determined by justices. The facts raise two questions—first, whether in such a case the justices have power to inquire and determine whether the claimant has the interest which he alleges; secondly, whether the claimant was required to give up possession before the expiration of his term within the meaning of the section. As regards the first point—namely, whether the justices have any jurisdiction to inquire into the title of the claimant to the interest which he alleges, we are clearly of opinion that they have no such right. The duty of the justices is, in this respect, practically the same as that which is under other sections of the Act to be discharged by juries and arbitrators. As was pointed out in the case of Reg. v. Lord Mayor of London, L. R. 2 Q. B. 292, 15 W. R. C. L. Dig. 28, the 121st section of the Act comes by way of proviso, taking out of the previous general enactment a particular breach for which it makes a particular provision, and therefore on principle the same rules as to investigation of title should apply, although the tribunal for assessing the amount of the compensation is different. A long series of authorities, commencing with Reg. v. London and North-Western Railway, and followed by many subsequent cases, have conclusively established that the jury or arbitrator has no right to try a question of the claimant's title to the interest which he alleges; any such question must be raised in subsequent proceedings, although there is no authority expressly dealing with the case under section 121. The same principle is, in our opinion, practically recognized in the case of Reg. v. Hannay, 23 W. R. Dig. 44 L. J. M. C. 27, and Cranwell v. Mayor of London, L. R. 5 Ex. 284, 18 W. R. C. L. Dig. 63. Therefore upon the first point we are of opinion that the claimants, alleging they had an interest as tenants from year to year, the justices were bound to assess compensation upon that basis, assuming no other objection would be taken to their jurisdiction. It is, however, a condition precedent to the right to claim compensation under section 121 that the claimant shall have been required to give up possession before the expiration of his term or interest therein, and that in that case he shall be entitled to compensation for the value of his unexpired term or interest. It is, we think, obvious from this language that the justices must ascertain whether or not the claimant has been required to give up possession before the expiration of his term because the question of compensation will depend upon that fact. If the claimant was required to give up possession only a few days before the expiration of his term the compensation would be very different from that which he would receive if he was required to give it up more than six months or it might be nearly eighteen months before his interest would be determined, and the cases of Reg. v. London and Southampton Railway, 10 Ad. & E., 3, and Reg. v. Stone, are, in our opinion, authorities to show that requirement to give up possession is an essential condition of the right to claim assessment of compensation under section 121. Applying this rule to the facts of this case it appears that notice to treat having been given to the claimants on the 14th of June, 1899, the terms on which they were holding expired on the 25th of December, 1899, and that they held over also on conditions which are not agreed, but which as the claimants claimed to be tenants from year to year would, as we have already said, compel justices to assess compensation on that basis; in the month of March, 1900, the claimants went out of occupation merely retaining the key. Nothing further happened as far as they were concerned until the 22nd of February, 1901, when the company, having taken an assignment of the landlord's interest, pulled the house down. Under these circumstances we are of opinion that there was no evidence that the claimants were required by the company to give up possession of lands occupied by them before the expiration of their term or interest and upon this ground the justices ought to have held that they could not assess any compensation. If the claimants have any claim against the company based upon the fact that when they went out of possessesion they retained the key this would not in our opinion be matter for compensation under section 121, but if any claim could be founded thereon, as to which we express no opinion, it would have to be dealt with by action as pointed out in the case of Cranwell v. The Lord Mayor of London, to which we have already referred. For the above reasons we are of opinion that judgment must be for the appellants.

BROWNE v. BRANDT. (a.)

Innkeeper—Rights of—Traveller—Power of innkeeper to refuse.

An innkeeper is not bound to admit travellers when the inn is full, and having regard to modern habits, it may be said to be full when all the bedrooms are occupied.

Appeal from Judge Martineau at the Brighton County Court.

The plaintiff was, on the 9th of April, 1901, driving a motor-car near the village of Horley, in Sussex. It broke down in the night, and he arrived at 2 a.m. at "The Chequers," a well-known inn there.

All the bedrooms were occupied, and the landlord refused to accommodate the plaintiff even in the sitting-room, who, however, received some refreshment.

The plaintiff was then compelled to find another inn, to which he drove in a hired brougham. He claimed damages for the refusal to admit him, and also for an attack of rheumatism which he alleged had been brought on by the defendant's conduct.

The county court judge found that the defendant had acted reasonably and was not liable.

E. T. H. Lawes, for the plaintiff.—The rule of law is that an innkeeper must admit all travellers unless the inn is full or the traveller is not a proper person to be admitted.

He cited Rex v. Ivens, 7 C. & P. 213; Fell v. Knight, 8 M. & W. 269; and Hawkins' Pleas of the Crown (7th ed.), p. 267.

English Harrison, K.C., and Burleigh Muir, for the defendants, were not called upon.

Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J.—In this case the plaintiff, having broken down in his motor-car, arrived at the plaintiff's inn, but after some discussion was not allowed to stay. He now brings an action asserting that the defendant has broken his common law duty by not allowing him to stay in the house. I do not think we ought to assume that the question before the learned county court judge was whether there had been a demand to take the one sitting-room, but we ought to assume in the plaintiff's favour that there was some room where he might have been able to pass the night. In my opinion it would be straining the common law rule if we were to hold that the plaintiff had a right of action. The common law provides that the innkeeper cannot select but must give accommodation to people who were in a position to pay and were not drunk or disorderly, but I cannot think that the authorities which have been cited before us mean that the landlord who provides a certain amount of bedrooms and sitting-rooms is under a legal obligation to receive as many guests as the inn will hold without overcrowding. There is, as I think, no legal right to pass the night in a sitting-room, and if all the bedrooms are full the landlord is not obliged to take in other travellers.

The landlord must, of course, act reasonably, but the county court judge had found that he had done so, and I therefore think that the county court judge was right, and this appeal must be dismissed with costs.

DARLING, J.—I agree. It seems to me that in this case the question is as to when an inn is full. I do not think that the old cases help us very much in this matter. In past times we know that people often used to sleep in one room, and even in one bed. What was called full in the fourteenth century would now be called indecent overcrowding. "Full" must therefore mean what, having regard to modern habits, "full" would mean now in a well-conducted inn. I think there might have been some difficulty if the plaintiff had expressed his willingness to pass the night in a sitting-room, and had not demanded a bed. But this does not arise here. The county court judge had come to the conclusion that, having regard to modern habits, this "inn" was full, all the bedrooms being occupied. He had referred to Chaucer and the Canterbury Pilgrims. One need only look at the "Sentimental Journey" to see how people's habits have altered since the time of Lawrence Sterne. I am of opinion that the county court judge's decision was right.

CHANNELL, J.—I agree.

Admiralty. May 6, 8.

"THE MARGERY." (a.)

Admiralty — Salvage — Associated insurance clubs — Arbitrations—Rights of a master and crew as salvors.

Where there is an agreement between amalgamated associations in which vessels are insured that the amount of remuneration payable for service rendered by one of the insured vessels to another shall be determined by a committee of the associations so concerned, if such agreement is to bind the master and crew of the salving vessel,

The Court will require cogent proof that the salvors did in fact agree to be bound by such agreement.

Quære, whether such a contract might not be contrary to the provisions of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894.

This was an appeal from a decision of the Yarmouth County Court, making a salvage award to the master and crew of the steam drifter Fifteen for services rendered to the ketch Margery under the following circumstances:

On the 9th of October, 1901, about 9 a.m. The Margery was herring fishing about thirty-six miles out from Yarmouth. The Margery was a wooden screw steam drifter of thirty-one tons register, carrying a crew of ten hands, her value being £2,000, and with nets and gear £300 more, together with fish on board valued at £1 10s. At the time in question the wind was blowing fresh from the north-west, and a heavy sea was running. The Margery had hauled in her nets and was preparing to make for port when it was discovered that she had lost her rudder. Two balls were hoisted to show that the ship was not under control, and being insured in an insurance club the house flag of the club was flown. She was worked in this condition by means of her propeller and sails until she was within about fourteen miles of Yarmouth when she fell in with the steam drifter Fifteen.

The Fifteen was a vessel of twenty-five tons, and was manned by a crew of ten hands, her value being £3,200, and she also was making for Yarmouth, having also been engaged in herring fishing.

A rope was passed to The Margery, but it shortly afterwards parted and fouled her propeller, and a wire hawser was then successfully passed and after about two hours' towage she was brought safely into Yarmouth by The Fifteen.

The Margery was insured in the United Kingdom Steam Tug and Trawler Insurance and Indemnity Association of North Shields, and The Fifteen was insured in the Total Loss Mutual Steamship Insurance Co. of Sunderland.

In the policies of both insurance companies it was provided that the articles of association of the assurer's company should be deemed to be part of the policy and should be binding upon the assured and assurers as fully and effectually as if such articles had been inserted in the policy, and that any breach of them should invalidate the policy.

The articles of the two clubs in which the vessels were respectively insured provided that the vessels insured with them should render each other mutual assistance if broken down or in distress, and it was further agreed in the articles by the insurance companies in question that compensation for services rendered should be decided and determined by the committees of the associations in which the vessels were insured.

Accordingly, in pursuance of the rules of the two clubs, a committee drawn from the directors of the United Kingdom Association and the Sunderland Association made an award on the 16th of December, 1901, of £25 to the owners of The Fifteen, which they accepted.

The master and crew were offered £12 10s. of this sum between them, but they refused to accept it, and on the 6th of January, 1902, they instituted the action in the Yarmouth County Court against The Margery for salvage, and from the order made in that action The Margery now appealed.

In the county court action it was admitted by the master and crew of The Fifteen that they knew of the arrangement as to mutual assistance, and that they acted upon it, and they acted upon it when they saw the club flag of The Margery flying, but they denied that they knew of or had ever agreed to any arbitration as the amount of salvage.

The agreement signed by the crew of The Fifteen provided that "every member of the crew, including apprentices and sea-fishing boys, shall be regarded as entitled to participate in any sum or sums of money arising from any salvage or salvage services performed for any ship in distress or otherwise in the proportion set forth opposite to their respective names in this agreement." By way of wages they were to take seven out of sixteen shares of the profits, and in salvage awards half. In the saloon of The Fifteen a card was hung up, on which was written, "The Total Loss Mutual Steamship Insurance Co., Sunderland. Notice to Masters.—The above association is amalgamated with the undermentioned associations and companies for the settlement of towage cases." Then followed the names of the associations, and among them was the United Kingdom Association. It then proceeded: "All masters of vessels insured in the Total Loss Insurance Co., Sunderland, are bound to render and accept assistance when necessary to and from any vessel insured in the above associations and companies."

The judge of the county court, sitting with nautical assessors, held that the master and crew of The Fifteen were not bound by the arbitration proceedings, and after hearing the case on the merits awarded them a sum of £60 as a salvage award, that sum being a moiety of the total salvage award he would have made if the owners of The Fifteen had also been parties to the suit.

Scrutton, K.C., and Roche, for the appellant.—The clause in the policies of insurance which incorporates the articles of association compelled the owners of the vessels insured to submit questions of salvage to arbitration. The notice exhibited in the saloon of the vessels and the agreements by which the crews signed on bound them to abide by arbitration.

They cited The Nasmyth, 33 W. R. 736, 10 P. D. 41.

Batten, for the respondents.—The appellant has failed to prove an agreement—express or implied—under which the master and crew bound themselves to abide by arbitration. But even if they did agree, such an agreement is contrary to the spirit of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894, for it would in effect oust the jurisdiction of the court. The articles relied on merely show what the shares in the salvage as between the master and the crew are to be, and the "notice" merely directs the masters to assist other club vessels, but does not lay down on what terms the assistance is to be rendered. The right to salvage is not dependent upon contract, but is a right given in the interests of commerce to those voluntarily undertaking risks to salve property, and if a contract be made in regard to it, the court will scrutinize such contract to see if it is against public policy. If there was a contract here the award made under it was grossly inadequate and the court below awarded nearly five times as much.

He cited The Britain, 1 Wm. Rob. 40; The Sarah Jane, 2 Wm. Rob. 110; The City of Calcutta, 8 Asp. M. L. C. 442, 47 W. R. Dig. 7.

JEUNE, P., in giving judgment, after stating the facts, said the question was whether the master and crew of The Fifteen were bound by the arbitration. Their contention was that they were not, and they asked to have the salvage award determined by the court. The court below had held that they were not so bound because they had never agreed to submit to arbitration. The master and crew as between themselves and their owners were bound to the extent that under their articles they had entered into an agreement by which they were to have half of whatever salvage amount should be awarded. But there was no agreement that as between themselves and the owners of any other ship which they might salve that they were bound by an agreement made by their owners to allow the matter to go to arbitration and take the money the arbitrators might award. Neither was it made out that there was notice of the terms of the arrangement made by the owners, nor any such acquiescence by the master of the ship which bound him, and much less the crew, to the settlement of the claim by arbitration.

The very fact that the card intituled "Notice to Masters" used the word "towage," and not "salvage," made clear that it was not intended thereby to give particulars of the agreement between the owners, for not all cases of salvage involved towage. Therefore, the notice, being limited to "the settlement of towage cases," could not be held to give notice of an arrangement for the peculiar settlement of salvage cases. It was not necessary now to decide how far this court would review a decision arrived at by arbitrators appointed in pursuance of an agreement made by persons sui juris and knowing all the circumstances. Neither was it necessary for the purposes of this case to decide whether such an agreement was in contravention to the provisions of the Merchant Shipping Act. As to the figure at which the court below arrived, although it was considerably in excess of the amount awarded by the arbitrators, it did not appear to this court that it was at all excessive, and it should not, therefore, be interfered with.

BARNES, J., after reviewing the facts, said it was quite clear to him that the master and crew never in fact thought that they were bound as salvors by what was suggested was an intimation to them that they were so bound.

The alleged contract put forward by the defendant entirely failed of proof, and to establish it much stronger evidence than had been offered would have to be put forward, and unless a great deal more was proved the master and crew must be held to remain free agents to render services upon such terms as were usual. It was not necessary to go into the very difficult question of what would have been the position if it had been proved that the master and crew had agreed to go to arbitration, or whether this court would have power to review any decision which might not meet, from any cause, the justice of the case, but he was not desirous of saying anything which might be construed as lessening in any way the jurisdiction of the court, nor did he wish to express any opinion as to how far the provisions of the Merchant Shipping Act might have affected the case.

Wrigley v. Whittaker & Sons. (a.)

Master and servant—Employers' liability—Sub-contracting—Work ancillary to business of undertakers—Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897 (60 & 61 Vict. c. 37), s. 7.

Where a workman's employers, who were engineers, contracted with a firm of cotton spinners to supply and fix a driving wheel in their cotton factory, and one of the engineers' workmen was accidentally killed while engaged in the operation of lifting the wheel into its place,

Held, that what took place in the cotton factory was not "on or in or about the factory" of the undertakers (the engineers), within the meaning of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897 (60 & 61 Vict. c. 37), s. 7.

Appeal from Court of Appeal (A. L. Smith, M.R., and Collins and Romer, L.JJ.), 49 W. R. 472, [1901] 1 K. B. 780.

Whittaker & Sons, the respondents, had entered into a contract with Bayley & Wright, who were cotton spinners, to supply and fix a new driving-wheel for a steam-engine in the cotton factory. A workman employed and sent by the engineers, while taking part in the operation of lifting the wheel into its place in Bayley & Wright's factory was accidentally killed in the course of his employment, and his widow, the present appellant, claimed compensation.

The lifting the wheel into its place was by means of a hand winch and pulleys.

The Court of Appeal held that the cotton spinners were not liable, and there was no appeal to the House of Lords on this question.

The Court of Appeal also held, the respondents, the engineers, were not liable, and against them was the present appeal. Francis v. Turner, 48 W. R. 228, [1900] 1 Q. B. 478, was considered binding on them, and that part of this case was not therefore gone into before the Court of Appeal.

Asquith, K.C., and John Montefiore (H. Clement Edwards with them), for the appellant.—Whittakers are the employers "on, in, or about" a factory. Nothing in Factory Acts which defines occupier within the Acts. It is of the nature of these engineering operations to carry through the work and to encounter the normal risks of the trade. If the operation is a composite operation, it is on, in, or about the work. When the occupier surrenders the premises for the operation you may say the employer (here the engineer) occupies. For the time the premises become part of a factory: see Factory Act, 1878, s. 93. Whenever the fixing requires engineering skill—mechanical power—is in fact, on the whole, an engineering work, there is a continuation of the work. And as regards engineering works, locality does not seem to enter into the test. As to temporary occupation, Bartell v. Gray, ante, p. 310, [1902] 1 K. B., 225, was referred to. Section 23 gives the artificial extension "actual use or occupation within Factory Acts."

Cripps, K.C., and F. H. Mellor, for the respondents, were not heard.

Earl of Halsbury, L.C.—After hearing the arguments that have been addressed to your lordships I must say there seems to me to be no ground for this appeal. The thing done was done not in a factory at all. When I say "not in a factory at all" the place where the thing happened was, it is true, a factory for some other purposes, but not a factory within the meaning of these words, which, I think, obviously means a factory where the original employers of the men were manufacturing—in this case big iron wheels. If the accident had happened there, I agree there would no doubt have been a liability, but in this case there was nothing of the sort. The act of manufacturing the wheel was complete and past. The wheel when completed was sent somewhere else. I will assume for this purpose (though I am sure I do not know whether it is the fact or not) that the place to which the wheel was sent was a factory—but it was a factory in another sense—and to say that you can put these two things together seems to me to be absolutely absurd. The thing that was being done was what is described as fitting the wheel to a cotton mill where the persons who were to pay for it wanted to have it put. Something was done there by a person sent by the original manufacturers, entirely away from their own place of manufacture, and an accident happened. I am wholly unable to put these two propositions together so as to make it possible to argue that thereupon that was an accident happening in the course of the employment in or about the factory, which was for the manufacture of iron wheels. I need not say any more about the case. It seems to me that the appeal is absolutely unarguable, and I move your lordships that it be dismissed.

EASTERN AND SOUTH AFRICAN TELEGRAPH CO. v. CAPE TOWN TRAMWAY COMPANIES. (a.)

Negligence—Damage by electricity—Statutory powers.

The respondent companies were authorized by statute to work tramways by electric power, and provision was made that in the event of any electric leak taking place and damage being caused by electrolysis or otherwise, that the companies should make good the damage, &c., and also that the tram rails were not to be used for the return of the electric current without consent, which was obtained upon conditions as to reversing the direction of the current, &c., and removing the danger. A short part of the tramway was not authorized by statute. Certain disturbances in the working of the appellants' submarine telegraph took place, caused by electricity which had been stored by respondents and used in propelling their cars on the above lines. This was brought about by a part of the electricity which escaped from the tram rails and reached the appellants' cable. It was afterwards discovered that the disturbances might be effectively provided against. The result was pecuniary loss to the appellants.

Held, (1) that the respondents were not liable at common law within the principle of Fletcher v. Rylands, L. R. 3 H. L. 330, 17 W. R. H. L. Dig. 17, there being no tangible injury caused by any unlawful use of their tramway by the respondents; (2) nor under the statutes.

Appeal from a judgment of the Supreme Court of the Cape of Good Hope.

The action was brought by the appellants, against the respondents for damages for disturbance of the appellants' cable messages and for an injunction.

The necessary facts are set out in their lordships' judgment.

The Supreme Court of the Cape held that the respondents were protected by the statutory provisions, and as to a small part of their tramway not covered by the statutory provisions, that there had been no infringement of the appellants rights.

The judgment of their lordships (Lords MACNAGHTEN, SHAND, DAVEY, ROBERTSON and LINDLEY) was delivered by Lord ROBERTSON.—The question raised by this appeal is whether the respondents are liable in damages for certain disturbances in the working of the appellants' submarine telegraph cable at Cape Town. That such disturbances did take place; that they were caused by electricity which had been stored by the respondents and used in propelling their tramcars in Cape Town and its suburbs, but from time to time had left the tramway system and found its way to the appellants' cable in the sea near Cape Town; and that pecuniary losses resulted; are matters beyond dispute. In order to the adequate understanding of the question thus raised it is not necessary to enter into minute or highly technical descriptions. It may conduce to clearness in the discussion of the legal questions which result if, leaving over in the meantime the mode in which the electricity left the respondents' system, it be in the first place stated how the electricity injured the appellants. At some point, then, in Table Bay, this electricity, having escaped and being at large, was attracted by the appellants' cable, entered the sheathing of the cable and by the sheathing as a conductor, found its way back to the tramway central station whence it had started, and thus completed its circuit. While travelling along the sheathing of the appellants' cable, the current varied very frequently and at irregular intervals, in accordance with the starting and stopping of the tramway cars. It was this irregularity and jerking which did the mischief; and, but for this, the current might have used the sheathing as a conductor without any injury. As things were, the current in the sheathing induced similar irregular currents in the conducting wire of the cable, with the result that the signals were interfered with, and as recorded were confused and unreadable. None of the apparatus was damaged; but the working of the apparatus was so interfered with as to take away its utility for the time of the interruption. In order to complete the description of the nature of the injury it is necessary to add that the difficulty has now been completely got over by laying what is called a twin-core cable for several miles out, the two wires rectifying one another's action. Now that this has been done the electricity from the tramways can pass along the sheathing without any harm being done. The cost of this remedial measure forms a large part of the claim in the suit, much of the rest representing experimental and tentative measures. Into this, however, it is unnecessary further to enter, as the quantum of damage is not raised in this appeal, but only the question of liability. Turning now to the mode of escape of the electricity from the tramways there is again no controversy; and for present purposes a succinct statement is sufficient. The respondents' tramway runs along the shore of the sea, and their tramcars are run by the tolerably familiar system of overhead trolley. All that is necessary to take note of is that the electricity which is used is generated at a power station erected by the respondents for that purpose, and that the conductor, which is provided for the return of the current, after driving the tramcars, consists of the tramway rails. Now, when uninsulated (and safety requires that this should be their condition), the rails are so far from being (even comparatively speaking) a perfect conductor, that necessarily and as a matter of course a considerable proportion of the electricity, instead of going directly back to the station, leaves the rails; and some portion of the escaped current it was, which reached the appellants' cable.

Upon these facts the appellants' main contention is that on the principle of Fletcher v. Rylands, L. R. 3 H. L. 330, 17 W. R. H. L. Dig. 17, the respondents are liable for the interruption of the appellants' business, and must recoup them for the protective measures necessarily taken to prevent a recurrence of such interruption. To this the respondents have a twofold answer: (1) They say that they are protected as regards all but a small portion of their tramway system by certain provisions which occur in each of the series of colonial statutes incorporating their constituent companies; and (2) as regards the part of their line not so protected by statute they maintain that Fletcher v. Rylands does not apply to the facts. Two other contentions have been advanced on the latter branch of the case (the first of which received more countenance in the Supreme Court than support at their lordships' bar)—viz., (1) that the law of Fletcher v. Rylands has no place in and then offered a large brewery known as the Caerphilly Brewery, Cardiff, to the defendants. This they at first refused to consider, but eventually they came to the conclusion that it would be more advantageous to cancel the agreement they had to brew and supply beer to Crosswell's (Limited), and to join with that company in promoting a new company to take over the houses owned by Crosswell's (Limited) and their own tied houses and to purchase the Caerphilly Brewery as a going concern to supply all the beer required by the amalgamation. The scheme was adopted and the Caerphilly Brewery was purchased by the new company for £172,500, and also one of the Cardiff houses introduced by the plaintiff—the Queen's Chamber Hotel—for £5,000. Under these circumstances the plaintiff claimed commission, and Channell, J., having decided in favour of the plaintiff, the defendants appealed.

Hugo Young, K.C., and Shakespeare, for the defendants.—The commission is not payable because it has never been earned within the terms of the commission note. The defendants did not purchase either of the two properties. When the new company was formed they sold to it the tied houses they themselves then held in the town, and received compensation for cancelling their agreement to supply all beer to Crosswell's (Limited). The plaintiff might be entitled to a quantum meruit from the new company for negotiating the sale to them, which would be outside any term of the contract note and would not be at the rate of more than a half or at the most one per cent. on the purchase-money of the brewery. The figure of 5 per cent. on the whole business that might be done showed that at the time the commission note was signed a possible amalgamation, and therefore a buying on a large scale, was not in the contemplation of either party.

S. T. Evans, K.C., David, and Sankey, for the plaintiff, were not heard.

COLLINS, M.R., in giving judgment, said: Two questions are raised by the case—first, whether Showell's Brewery Co. are liable on the document signed by Mr. Young; and secondly, whether in the events which have happened the purchase had been brought about by the plaintiff. The plaintiff had brought his action against the two companies—Showell's (Limited) and Crosswell's (Limited), and Crosswell's (Limited) being in liquidation, judgment went against the other defendants, who now appealed. Now it is clear that although those were two separate companies their interests were intimately connected the one with the other. For instance, Mr. Charles Showell, who was the leading spirit, was a director of each company. It appeared that the directors felt it was very desirable that the business in Wales should be extended, and with that view it was decided to purchase public-houses that might come into the market which would be suitable for tied houses. It was on that footing that Mr. Young, who was a director of Crosswell's only, approached the plaintiff, and the result of his interview was the sending of the commission note. It was said that this commission note did not bind Showell's Brewery because there was no evidence that Mr. Young had authority from that company to make a contract. It seems to me clear on the evidence that Mr. Young had first consulted and had in fact obtained the authority of Mr. Charles Showell, who as managing director had unquestionably power to bind the appellant company, before he gave the note. There is cogent evidence that Mr. Charles Showell knew that the contract note was to be sent; and it is clear that the document was given by Mr. Young under circumstances that bound the appellant company. Then the second question arose—namely, whether the sale was brought about by the introduction of the plaintiff. His evidence showed that at first the plaintiff only submitted small licensed property, and then offered the Caerphilly Brewery. That offer was carefully considered by the directors, and it was thought that it was too big a concern for them to take up. Then it appeared to have been pointed out that there were other brewers ready to buy, and that the opportunity ought not to be lost, and then for the first time the scheme was formulated by which Showell's cancelled their right to supply all the beer sold by the tied houses of the Crosswell Co., and agreed to join with that company in promoting a new company to acquire the Caerphilly Brewery, the Crosswell Co.'s interest, and such other houses as the Showell Brewery held in that district. The scheme was for the benefit of Showell's Co., for they got compensation for the cancellization of their right to supply beer to Crosswell's, and disposed of their houses, retaining, nevertheless, an interest in the new company. It was said that this was not a purchase by the two defendant companies of the property within the meaning of the commission note. If Showell's Brewery had purchased the Caerphilly Co., and then transferred that property to the new company, the state of affairs would have been the same and this question could not have been raised. In my view the mere buying to sell again to the new company was but an immaterial link in the chain of events. By it being cut out, the position of the parties was not changed. Here, then, there is evidence, first, that if the property was bought through the introduction of the plaintiff the defendants are liable to pay him commission, and there is evidence that the property had been purchased under those circumstances. Therefore the plaintiff is entitled to his commission, and the judgment appealed from must stand and this appeal be dismissed with costs.

MATHEW and COZENS-HARDY, L.JJ., gave judgment to the same effect.

Appeal dismissed.

HUGHES v. PUMP HOUSE HOTEL CO. (LIMITED). (a.)

Practice—Assignment of debt—Absolute assignment—Security for moneys due or to become due on a banking account—Right of assignor to sue—Judicature Act, 1873 (36 & 37 Vict. c. 66), s. 25, sub-section 6.

The plaintiff, a builder, entered into a contract with the defendants to execute certain building work at their hotel. Subsequently the plaintiff, by an instrument in writing, assigned to his bankers, by way of continuing security for all moneys due or to become due to them from him, all moneys due or to become due to him from the defendants under the contract. Notice of this assignment was given to the defendants, and at the same time a letter was written to them by the plaintiff authorizing and requesting them to pay the moneys to the bankers, whose receipt should be their sufficient discharge. In an action by the plaintiff to recover the moneys due under the contract,

(a.) Reported by W. F. BARRY, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Held, that this was an absolute assignment not purporting to be by way of charge only, within the meaning of section 25, sub-section 6, of the Judicature Act, 1873, and that the plaintiff was not entitled to sue.

Appeal from a decision of Wright, J., upon a point of law raised upon the pleadings.

The plaintiff, who was a builder, on the 1st of November, 1899, entered into a contract with the defendants, whereby he agreed to complete the new pump-room and to make certain alterations and additions to the Pump House Hotel, at Llandrindod Wells, for the sum of £6,200, any extras to be added to this amount. On the 7th of March, 1901, the plaintiff gave the following assignment in writing to Lloyds Bank (Limited):—

"In consideration of your continuing a banking account with me, the undersigned Ralph Merton Hughes, of . . . and by way of continuing security to you for all moneys due or to become due to you from me alone or jointly with others either on the said account or otherwise, I hereby assign to you all moneys due or to become due to me from the Pump House Hotel Co. (Limited), of Llandrindod Wells, under or by virtue of a certain contract dated the 1st day of November, 1899, and made between the said Pump House Hotel Co. (Limited), of the one part, and myself, of the other part (being a contract for completion of the new pump-room and for making certain alterations and additions to the Pump House Hotel, Llandrindod Wells), and all other moneys, if any, due or to become due to me from the said company, including all moneys due or to become due for extras in connection with the works contemplated by the said contract. And I hereby empower you, on my behalf and in my name, to settle and adjust all accounts in connection with the works and matters aforesaid, to give effectual receipts for the moneys hereby assigned, which shall discharge the person paying same from being concerned to see to the application thereof; also if necessary to sue for or take such other steps as you may think necessary for enforcing payment of the moneys hereby assigned or any part thereof; and to compromise and settle any such proceedings on such terms as you may think fit, it being understood that all costs and expenses of recovering the moneys hereby assigned are to be paid out of the amount recovered. And I hereby undertake, at your request and my cost, to do and execute all such further acts, deeds, and things as you may reasonably require for giving full effect to the security hereby created."

On the same date the solicitors for Lloyds Bank wrote to the defendants giving them notice of the assignment, and requiring them "not to pay the said moneys or any part thereof to any person other than Lloyds Bank (Limited) without their written consent." The solicitors also enclosed a request, signed by the plaintiff, authorizing and requesting the defendants to pay the said moneys to the bank, whose receipt should be their sufficient discharge.

On the 31st of October, 1901, the plaintiff brought the present action, claiming £2,788 for the balance of account, being chiefly in respect of extras. In the statement of defence the defendants, besides denying that the balance alleged or any sum was due, pleaded that, "by reason of the said assignment and notice, the defendants will contend that the plaintiff is not entitled to sue for the sums so assigned, and that the plaintiff has no interest in the same and no cause of action." The plaintiff, in his reply, said that the assignment was not an absolute assignment, but was by way of charge only as a continuing security to Lloyds Bank for all moneys due or to become due to them from him. This point was ordered to be argued first.

Wright, J., held that the assignment was not an absolute assignment within section 25, sub-section 6, of the Judicature Act, 1873, and that the action was properly brought in the name of the assignor; and, with the plaintiff's consent, in order to protect the defendants he ordered that no payment out of court of any money which might be paid into court by the defendants should be made, and that no execution should issue for any sum recovered on judgment without the consent of Lloyds Bank or leave of the court or judge.

A summons was then taken out by the defendants at chambers asking that the action should be stayed until Lloyds Bank were joined as plaintiffs in the action.

Wright, J., at chambers, dismissed the summons. The defendants appealed from both orders, and the two appeals were taken together.

June 10.—S. T. Evans, K.C., and R. E. Vaughan Williams, for the defendants.—This is an absolute assignment, not purporting to be by way of charge only, within the meaning of section 25, sub-section 6, of the Judicature Act, 1873. The fact that it is an assignment as a security for moneys due or to become due on a banking account does not make it the less an absolute assignment. A right of redemption in the mortgagor does not prevent the assignment from being absolute: Tancred v. Delagoa Bay Railway Co., 38 W. R. 15, 23 Q. B. D. 239; Durham Brothers v. Robertson, [1898] 1 Q. B. 765, 46 W. R. Dig. 9. [They also referred to Brice v. Bannister, 26 W. R. 670, 3 Q. B. D. 569; Comfort v. Betts, 39 W. R. 595, [1891] 1 Q. B. 737; Wiesener v. Rackow, 76 L. T. Rep. 448, 45 W. R. Dig. 118; Mercantile Bank of London v. Evans, [1899] 2 Q. B. 613, 48 W. R. Dig. 145; Jones v. Humphreys, ante, p. 191, [1902] 1 K. B. 10. Secondly, if this is not an absolute assignment within section 25, sub-section 6, of the Judicature Act, 1873, it is an equitable assignment, and in order to protect the defendants the equitable assignees ought to be joined as co-plaintiffs. If they are not joined as parties, they will not be bound by the result of this action, and the defendants may be sued a second time.

They referred upon this point to Jones v. Farrell, 1 De G. & J. 208.

Lewis M. Richards, for the plaintiff.—This is not an absolute assignment of a debt or other legal chose in action within section 25, sub-section 6, of the Judicature Act, 1873. It is only an assignment pro tanto—that is, an assignment sufficient to secure the repayment of so much as might be due upon a banking acount. Such an assignment does not come within the section: Mercantile Bank of London v. Evans. The assignment purports on its face to be by way of charge only. It is not an assignment of a fixed sum, but of an unascertained sum, which can only be ascertained by taking the accounts. It is not, therefore, an absolute assignment within the section: Jones v. Humphreys. If that is so, there is no power to compel the bank to join as plaintiffs.

S. T. Evans, K.C., in reply.—If the whole sum is absolutely assigned, as in the case of a mortgage, though it may be as security for fluctuating sums, it comes within the Act. In Mercantile Bank of London v. Evans and Jones v. Humphreys there was not an assignment of the whole sum, but only of part.

June 11.—MATHEW, L.J.—The first appeal in this case is from the decision of Wright, J., who held that the assignment was not an absolute assignment within section 25, sub-section 6, of the Judicature Act, 1873, but was only a charge, and that therefore the action was properly brought in the name of the assignor. The contention of the defendants is that the assignment was an absolute one, and that therefore the action could not be brought in the name of the assignor. In every case of this kind it is necessary to refer to the terms of the assignment, and to ascertain what its true meaning is. Whatever may be the phraseology used, if no more than a charge was intended the action must be brought by the assignor. If, on the other hand, all the rights of the assignor were intended to pass to the assignee, the case would come within section 25, sub-section 6, of the Act. It was argued on behalf of the defendants that it is clear that the assignment from its terms was an absolute assignment. The plaintiff, who was a builder, had, in November, 1899, contracted with the defendants to execute certain building works at the Pump House Hotel for a fixed sum, any extras to be paid for in addition. In March, 1901, the plaintiff executed the assignment in question in favour of Lloyds Bank. Notice of the assignment was given to the defendants, and an authority was sent to them requesting them to pay the moneys to the bank. When the works were completed disputes arose as to amount of the balance payable to the plaintiff, and the plaintiff brought this action. Objection was taken that the action should have been brought in the name of the assignee and not in the name of the assignor. What is the effect of the assignment, coupled with the notice thereof to the defendants and the authority and request to the defendants to pay the moneys to Lloyds Bank? It seems to me that a clear intention is shown to pass to the bank the complete control over all the moneys payable to the plaintiff under the contract. It places the bank for all purposes in the position of the plaintiff. That being so, unless there is some difficulty in the way, it is clear that there is what may be described as an absolute assignment. An absolute assignment is one which passes all the rights of the assignor to the assignee. My brother Wright held that the assignment was not an absolute one because it was a continuing security for moneys due or to become due to the bank. If that were the true criterion, a mortgage could not be an absolute assignment within the Act. A mortgage is a security, but at the same time it is an absolute assignment within the Act, because all the rights of the mortgagor in the property assigned pass to the mortgagee. The same principle is illustrated by the cases of Comfort v. Betts and Durham Brothers v. Robertson. In Comfort v. Betts certain creditors assigned their debts to a trustee to enable him to sue for and recover them, and he was to pay the creditors the amount of their debts out of the proceeds. It was there held that there was an absolute assignment intending to pass all the assignor's interest in the debts to the assignee, and none the less so because there was a trust in respect of the moneys recovered. That principle seems to me to be entirely applicable to the present case. The two cases of Mercantile Bank of London v. Evans and Jones v. Humphreys were principally relied on by the plaintiff. In each of those cases there were general words of assignment, in the form of a security, and expressly intended only to assign so much as would be sufficient to provide the sums of £200 in the one case and of £22 10s. in the other case. It is manifest that the true character of the assignment in both those cases was to confer a charge only. The distinction between those cases and the present is sufficiently obvious and need not be dwelt upon further. Other questions were suggested during the course of the argument. One was whether an absolute assignment of part of a debt comes within the Act. It is not necessary to express any opinion upon that question further than to say that there seems to me to be considerable reason for saying that such an assignment does not come within section 25, sub-section 6. That question, however, still remains open for argument on some further occasion when it arises. Another question raised in the second appeal was whether, if this were not an absolute assignment, the assignees should have been joined as plaintiffs. It is not necessary to decide that question. This being an absolute assignment the action is not maintainable by the plaintiff. The appeal from the first order must therefore be allowed.

COZENS-HARDY, L.J., read the following judgment: The question raised by this appeal is whether a document of the 7th of March, 1901, is "an absolute assignment (not purporting to be by way of charge only)" within the meaning of section 25, sub-section 6, of the Judicature Act, 1873. Now it has been repeatedly held that the word "absolute" does not mean absolute by way of sale, and that an assignment may be "absolute" though by way of mortgage: see Burlinson v. Hall, 32 W. R. 492, 12 Q. B. D. 347; Tancred v. Delagoa Bay Railway Co. Those were decisions of Divisional Courts, but the Court of Appeal has adopted the same view. In Durham Brothers v. Robertson, [1898] 1 Q. B. 765, 46 W. R. Dig. 9, this court held that the particular document in question was not absolute but conditional. Chitty, L.J.'s, judgment is, however, very much in point. [His lordship read from the judgment in that case, at pp. 771, 772.] It was suggested to us in argument that this was in some way inconsistent with the subsequent case in this court of Mercantile Bank of London v. Evans. I cannot, however, adopt this contention. On the construction of the particular document before them, the court in that case held that there was not an assignment of the whole debt. The position of a mortgagee of a debt was not in any way challenged. I may observe that A. L. Smith, L.J., was a party to the decision in Burlinson v. Hall. If on the construction of the document it appears to be an absolute assignment, though subject to an equity of redemption express or implied, it cannot, in my opinion, be material to consider what was the consideration for the assignment, or whether the security was for a fixed and definite sum, or for a current account. In either case the debtor can safely pay the assignee, and he is not concerned to inquire into the state of the accounts between the assignor and the assignee. Nor does it matter that the assignee has obtained a power of attorney and a covenant for further assurance from the assignor. Both these elements were found in Burlinson v. Hall. The real question, and in my opinion the only question, is this: Does the instrument purport to be by way of charge only? It remains to apply these principles to the document of the 7th of March, 1901. In my opinion this is an absolute assignment, and it does not purport to be by way of charge only. It assigns all money due or to become due under the contract. It follows that the plaintiff Hughes has no right of action, and that the order of Wright, J., must be discharged. In the view which I take it is not necessary to express any opinion upon the second appeal.

Administration — Gavelkind — Descent — Partibility among heirs male—Extension to collaterals.

The rule that land held according to the tenure of gavelkind is partible among the nearest male heirs extends to collaterals to the remotest degree.

Summons.

Francis Chenoweth, the testator, died on the 23rd of March, 1901.

An originating summons was taken out to determine the construction of his will, and the court found that in the events that had happened, the testator had died intestate as to his residuary real and personal estate.

By an order of the court dated the 16th of May, 1901, it was declared that there was an intestacy of the residuary real and personal estate, and inquiries were directed as to who was the heir-at-law and who were the heir or heirs according to the custom of gavelkind.

The master was unable to determine who were the heirs according to the custom of gavelkind, and the summons was therefore adjourned to court.

At his death the testator held four freehold houses at Milton, near Gravesend, in the county of Kent. The presumption was that these houses were held by the tenure of gavelkind, and there was no evidence to rebut it. The testator left no lineal descendants and no brothers or sisters or lineal descendants of them; his nearest collateral male relatives on the paternal side at the time of his death being two first cousins and the three sons of a deceased first cousin.

The point to be decided was whether the rule, that land held according to the custom of gavelkind was partible among the nearest male heirs, extended to collaterals in all degrees, or to the issue of brothers and sisters only.

H. Langford Lewis, for the plaintiff, the executor of the will.

Jenkins, K.C., and H. Greenwood, for testator's heir-at-law.—The question was one of fact. The rule of partibility in gavelkind did not extend among collaterals beyond brothers and the issue of brothers: Muggleton v. Barnett, 6 W. R. 182, 2 H. & N. 653; Hooke v. Hooke, 11 W. R. 105, 1 H. & M. 43; Bacon's Abridgment under Descent (D), ed. 1832, vol. 2, p. 641; and Coke on Litt. 140*a*.

Upjohn, K.C., and J. Randall Stainer.—Gavelkind was the common law of Kent. If the question to be decided was one of fact only, then there was ample authority that the rule as to partibility extended beyond brothers and the issue of brothers. There were two unreported cases mentioned in a note in Robinson on Gavelkind (5th ed.), at p. 93*n*—viz., Cole v. Wade, 1790, and In re Fullager, 1812. The land was partible among all the male heirs.

Counsel referred to the Statute de Prærogativa Regis (17 Edw. 2, c. 16); An Act Changing the Custom of Gavelkind 31 (Hen. 8, c. 3); Year Books of 2 Edw. 3, 12; 3 Edw. 3, 38; 5 Edw. 3, 64; 8 Edw. 3, 42; 26 Hen. 8, 4; Chitty on Descents, 186-9; Third Report of the Real Property Commissioners, p. 8; Lambarde's Perambulation of Kent, 1656, p. 584; Cruise's Digest, tit. 29, cap. 5, s. 2.

(a.) Reported by J. H. DAVIES, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

FARWELL, J., held that the question was one of law and not of fact, in this respect differing from questions relating to ordinary manorial customs, which had to be established by evidence. The tenure of gavelkind was, however, part of the common law in Kent. In so far as it was a question of law it was necessary, according to the usual practice of the courts, in the absence of direct decisions, to cite the opinions of learned writers on the law. His lordship found, on consulting works such as Robinson on Gavelkind, Watkins on Descents, Chitty on Descents, the Third Report of the Real Property Commissioners, and Mr. Elton's book on the Tenures of Kent, that the opinion generally held was in favour of the absolute generality of the rule as to partibility. As against this view there were only the opinions of two conveyancers given in the case of Gooding v. Gooding, a case which was compromised, but was discussed in Chitty on Descents, 1825, p. 183, and a statement made in Bacon's Abridgment under Descent (D). But even assuming that the question was one of fact and not of law, it was clear from Doe d. Mason v. Mason, 3 Wil. 63, that a single instance was sufficient to prove a custom of the sort, and such an instance was found in an unreported case of Cole v. Wade, from which it appeared that second cousins once removed had been accepted as co-heirs in gavelkind. The result was that he found as a question of fact what he had already found as a question of law, that the rule of partibility in gavelkind extended to collaterals to the remotest degree.

REYNOLDS v. ELLIS. (a.)

Married woman—Husband and wife—Settlement—Covenant to settle after-acquired property — Bequest to separate use subject to restraint on anticipation—"During the coverture"—Property acquired after decree of separation pronounced by foreign court—Marriage with foreigner—Domicil—Settlement in English form—Subject-matter of settlement in England.

Where a legacy is given to a married woman for her separate use absolutely, and by a subsequent clause in the will she is restrained from anticipation; inasmuch as she would, notwithstanding the restraint, be entitled to the interest on the legacy when the time for paying such interest arrived, the legacy is bound by a covenant to settle after-acquired property contained in her marriage settlement.

Where by the law of a foreign country a decree of judicial separation pronounced by a court in such country has no effect on the property rights of the husband and wife, property falling into possession after the pronouncement of the decree is bound by the covenant.

On the marriage of an Englishwoman with an Italian property in England was made the subject of a settlement in English form. The settlement was executed by the intended husband and wife in Italy, where the marriage took place. By the law of Italy the settlement would have been invalid, not only through informalities attending its execution, but also because it contained dispositions of property prohibited by that law.

Held, that the settlement must be construed according to English law.

(a.) Reported by H. L. ORMISTON, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Held, also, that the covenant to settle after-acquired property on the trusts of the settlement was valid and could be enforced, even though by the law of the matrimonial domicil such trusts were illegal.

Viditz v. O'Hagan, 48 W. R. 516, [1900] 2 Ch. 87, distinguished.

Action without witnesses.

This was an action brought by the present trustee of the settlement, dated the 28th of March, 1878, made on the marriage of Kate Anderton with Angelo Faveroni, to determine whether two legacies bequeathed to her were subject to a covenant to settle after-acquired property contained in that settlement.

The settlement, which was in the ordinary English form and had reference to a sum of money which was then invested in an English security, contained a power to call in the sum and invest it in other English securities, and provided that the income should, during the joint lives of the wife and husband, be paid to the wife, and after the death of one of them, to the survivor during his or her life, and after the death of the survivor that the capital should be held in trust for the children of the marriage, and in default of such children, if the wife survived the husband, for her absolutely, but if the husband survived the wife, as she should by will appoint, and in default of appointment for such person or persons as under the statutes for the distribution of the effects of intestates would have become entitled thereto at her death if she had died possessed thereof intestate and without having been married. The settlement contained a common form covenant on the part of the wife to settle after-acquired property on the trusts of the settlement.

Prior to her marriage Kate Faveroni had an English domicil; Angelo Faveroni was then a lieutenant in the Italian army. In accordance with the rules of that service she deposited £1,000 with the Italian military authorities; it appeared from the evidence that that sum constituted her "dote" or marriage portion, and could not be withdrawn until the husband had left the service or the wife had died. The marriage was solemnized in Italy, the settlement having been previously executed by both husband and wife in that country.

There were no children of the marriage, and on the 8th of March, 1898, an Italian tribunal decreed the separation of Kate Faveroni and Angelo Faveroni. Since the date of the decree they lived apart.

By his will, dated the 17th of February, 1877, Meyrick Bankes, who died on the 16th of June, 1881, and who was the father of Kate Faveroni, bequeathed to her certain property subject to the life interest therein of his widow. The will contained a declaration that all moneys by his will made payable to any female should, during any and every coverture, be paid to her for her sole and separate use free from marital control when and as the same should become due and payable and so that she should not have power to deprive herself of the benefit thereof by anticipation, and that her receipt alone, whether covert or sole, should be a good discharge for such moneys.

By her will, dated the 8th of November, 1892, Eleanor Bankes (the widow of Meyrick Bankes), who died on the 25th of January, 1899, and who was the mother of Kate Faveroni, bequeathed to her a legacy of £1,000.

It appeared from the evidence that Kate Faveroni on her marriage acquired an Italian domicil; that, in Italy, marriage does not affect the rights of the wife in respect of her property except in regard to the "dote" hereinbefore referred to; and that the decree of separation had no other effect than to sanction the separation of the husband and wife by their mutual consent, and to allow them to live apart from each other. It also appeared that, by Italian law, the settlement of the 28th of March, 1878, was invalid, for the reasons that it was not in the prescribed form, was not executed before a notary, that it violated the Italian law of succession, and that Italian law does not recognize trusts.

After the issue of the writ Angelo Faveroni became of unsound mind, and by an order of the court the official solicitor was appointed his guardian ad litem.

Buckmaster, K.C., and S. B. L. Druce, for the plaintiff, supported the settlement on the ground that it must have been the intention of the parties that English law should apply.

They cited Van Grutten v. Digby, 11 W. R. 230, 31 Beav. 561; South African Breweries v. King, 48 W. R. 289, [1900] 1 Ch. 273; Hamlyn v. Talisker Distillery, [1894] A. C. 202; and In re Mégret, [1901] 1 Ch. 547, 49 W. R. Dig. 37.

H. Terrell, K.C., and P. S. Stokes, for Mrs. Faveroni.—Whether English or Italian law governs the construction of the settlement, Mrs. Faveroni is absolutely entitled to both legacies. With respect to the property which she took under her father's will, the case is covered by In re Currey, 34 W. R. 541, 32 Ch. D. 361. A covenant by a woman, that if during coverture, she shall become entitled to any property as to which she is restrained from anticipation, she will settle such property, is inoperative. With respect to the legacy which she took under her mother's will, that legacy did not fall due until after the separation, and she is released from the covenant to settle that legacy on the principle of Davenport v. Marshall, ante, p. 39, [1902] 1 Ch. 82. The object of the covenant is to exclude the husband; in England the wife is protected by a separation order, and thereupon becomes a feme sole. There is no difference between such a case and the present case, where the wife is treated as a feme sole by the Italian law both before and after the separation.

Astbury, K.C., and T. T. Methold, for Mr. Faveroni.—The restraint on anticipation endures only to the date of payment, and then becomes inoperative; the legacy under her father's will thereupon became payable to her: In re Bown, 33 W. R. 58, 27 Ch. D. 411; In re Holmes, 67 L. T. Rep. 335; and In re Wood, 61 L. T. Rep. 197, 38 W. R. Dig. 125. This legacy is therefore caught by the covenant to settle. Davenport v. Marshall has no application; that was a case of an English judicial separation which resulted in section 57 of the Divorce Act coming into operation. It is absurd to say that a voluntary separation has the same effect: on this point they cited Dawes v. Creyke, 33 W. R. 869, 30 Ch. D. 500.

O. L. Clare, for the legal personal representatives of Mrs. Bankes.

Terrell, K.C., in reply.—In regard to the legacy as to which she was restrained from anticipation, the words of Chitty, J., in In re Currey, 32 Ch. D., at p. 363, are in point. In re Bown and In re Holmes only say that when there is a bequest to a married woman for her separate use absolutely, and the gift is followed by a restraint of anticipation, the property may be transferred to her as soon as it falls into possession; it does not follow that she can, before the property falls into possession, covenant to alienate it. If it does, the same argument would extend to every case of restraint upon anticipation.

BUCKLEY, J.—The only question I have to decide at the present moment is this: Mr. Terrell, appearing for the wife, says it is immaterial to determine whether English law or Italian law applies, for whether it be the one or the other, the wife is entitled. To that Mr. Astbury, for the husband, replies that if the Italian law is applicable, no doubt the covenant is inoperative, but that if the English law applies the covenant to settle after-acquired property is operative, and therefore it is necessary to say which law applies. Substantially I think what I have to decide is whether the covenant by the lady to settle after-acquired property contained in this settlement is valid if the English law is the law to be applied.

Now the settlement was executed on the 28th of July, 1878. I am proceeding now upon the hypothesis that the English law is applicable. It contained a covenant to settle after-acquired property in the usual form—that if she was, or during the then intended coverture she or the husband in her right should be or become entitled to real or personal property of the value of £100, then it should be settled. The property as to which the question arises is of two descriptions. The first which I will take is property which she derives under her father's will. Her father died in 1881—that is to say, three years after the date of the settlement. His will contained certain dispositions in her favour, and his will contained this clause. [His lordship then read the declaration above set out, and continued:] Now upon words such as those the Court of Appeal has held, in In re Bown and In re Holmes, that when the time comes at which the legacy is payable or transferable, the married woman, whether under coverture or not, is entitled to ask for payment or transfer, notwithstanding the words that she should not have power to deprive herself of the benefit thereof by anticipation. To express that in my own words as matter of construction, a clause such as this, directing payment at a date, and then saying that the payee shall not have power to deprive herself of the benefit thereof by anticipation, means by way of anticipation before the date, because, if the date for payment comes, and the lady receive the money, then the donor or grantor cannot say that she shall not spend it or do what she pleases with it, give it away—and, as matter of construction, the restraint on anticipation is one which endures up to the date of payment, and as from the date of payment becomes inoperative. That seems to me to be the effect of In re Bown and In re Holmes. Then Mr. Terrell says, and says truly, that in In re Currey Chitty, J., following previous decisions, and in particular one of Sir George Jessel in In re Ellis' Trusts, 22 W. R. 448, L. R. 17 Eq. 409, held that a restraint on anticipation is equivalent to a restraint on alienation, and that, therefore, when there is an effectual restraint on anticipation the person so restrained cannot alienate, because that is a form of anticipation. Now what took place here? In 1878 the lady, who was not entitled to this property at all at that time, because it came under the will of a person who died in 1881, covenanted that if she became entitled to any money she would settle it. Under the will of a testator who died in 1881 she became entitled to property upon which there was a restraint on anticipation until the date of payment, if my view of the construction is right as to the effect of In re Bown and In re Holmes. As soon as the date of payment arrived that was money which simply belonged to her. She could take it and spend it, and if she would take it and spend it I am unable to understand why she should not by her ante-nuptial settlement executed in 1878 have bound herself that that money, which she might have spent, she would not spend, but would settle. I do not think that In re Currey applies to a state of things in which the clause is in the form of In re Bown and In re Holmes, and in the form in which it is here. Directly you find that, under the operation of the gift, she becomes entitled to the money, so that, under the form of the gift, there is no longer any restraint on anticipation, or, which is the same thing, restraint on alienation, I do not know why she should not become bound by her covenant to deal with it in a particular way. It seems to me, therefore, that, as regards this property under the father's will, this covenant is a covenant operative as from the date when the interest under that will became payable.

Now the other property was property which she derived under her mother's will, and that, so I am told, was simply a legacy of £1,000. There is no clause about any restraint on anticipation as regards that. That is money which came to her during the marriage, and the question is whether the covenant to settle applies to that. As to this sum—and if I was wrong as to what I have said as to the sum under the father's will also—another argument is raised, and it is this—namely, that there was in March, 1898, a decree of separation pronounced by an Italian court, and it is said that the covenant to settle after-acquired property became, as from 1898, a dead thing, because the covenant was to settle what came to her during any coverture, and that the coverture was then over; and it is said that a decision of my own in Davenport v. Marshall is applicable to that state of things. I do not think Davenport v. Marshall has anything to do with it. The ground of Davenport v. Marshall was this, that as from a decree pronounced by the Divorce Court in this country, or a judicial separation pronounced by the court, a section of the Matrimonial Causes Act enacts that the wife shall, from the date of the order, be considered as a feme sole with respect to property, and I thought that a covenant to settle after-acquired property was only intended, according to its true construction, to apply during such time as that state of things did not exist, when she was not a feme sole with respect to property. Now the evidence as to this Italian order is that it has no such effect as a judicial separation decree of the English court. The evidence as to the Italian law is that neither the marriage of an Italian person, nor a separation order, as a separation order, has any effect on the wife's property, and that she remains entitled to property as if she had never been married, and that a separation order does not alter her right in respect of property. The whole ground, therefore, of the decision in Davenport v. Marshall is different, and I think the point does not arise. Under these circumstances it seems necessary to determine whether the English or the Italian law is applicable.

H. Terrell, K.C.—This contract must be construed as an Italian contract. In marriage settlements, in the absence of a contrary intention, the rule of construction is that the law of the domicil of the husband applies: Dicey's Conflict of Laws, p. 652. Here, admittedly, the matrimonial domicil was Italian. The settlement was executed by both parties in Italy. The marriage was solemnized in Italy, where the parties intended to permanently reside. Van Grutten v. Digby is distinguishable. If the settlement is construed according to Italian law, it is wholly invalid. Furthermore, by the alteration in the wife's domicil her power to carry out the contract to settle after acquired property came to an end, for her covenant that she will, at a date when she is subject to Italian law, do something which is not allowed by that law.

He referred to Chamberlain v. Napier, 29 W. R. 194, 15 Ch. D. 614, and Viditz v. O'Hagan, 48 W. R. 516, [1900] 2 Ch. 87.

T. T. Methold.—There are clear evidences of a contrary intention within Van Grutten v. Digby; for example, the investment clause, which confines investment to England, and the ultimate limitation to the next-of-kin according to the statute. The whole of the settlement would have been invalid according to the Italian law. It is impossible to suppose that a contract should be entered into with reference to a law by which it would be invalid. [He referred to In re Barnard, 56 L. T. Rep. 9, 35 W. R. Dig. 177; Co. Litt. 42*a*.] The covenant to assign after-acquired property operated in equity as a conveyance.

H. Terrell, K.C., replied.

BUCKLEY, J., stated the facts, and continued: It seems to me that, upon those facts, I ought to arrive at the conclusion that the parties intended to contract according to the English law. The general proposition as stated in Dicey's Conflict of Laws, at p. 653, is this, that "a marriage contract or settlement will, in the absence of reason to the contrary, be construed with reference to the law of the matrimonial domicil." The matrimonial domicil here was Italian, no doubt, so that primâ facie this ought to be construed with reference to the law of the matrimonial domicil. But is there reason to the contrary? It seems to me, on the facts I have mentioned, there is reason to the contrary. I therefore think the English law, and not the Italian law, ought to be applied.

Then this is further argued, that, though according to the English law, which, I think, has to be applied, the lady covenanted that she would, at a future time, so dispose of her after-acquired property as that it would come within the settlement, yet that when she married an Italian she acquired an Italian domicil, and could not, according to the Italian law, do that thing and therefore, upon the doctrine of Viditz v. O'Hagan, it is said that the covenant cannot have effect. Now it seems to me that that is not so. In Viditz v. O'Hagan the point was that the settlement was executed by an infant who could not bind herself at all, and the question was whether, by acts done after attaining majority, there had been such an affirmation of the settlement as that it became binding; in other words, the settlement, when executed, was nothing, and unless you applied the English law as to affirmation and confirmation it bound nothing. Now here, if I am right, the settlement at the outset was binding because it was executed by a person competent to bind herself. Then if I am entitled to treat the English law as being applicable to it, she could, according to our law, bind herself in respect of her after acquired-property, and although it took the form of a covenant, and not of an assignment, that would make no difference. On that ground it seems to me that the covenant was effectual, and I therefore hold that this matter is to be governed by English law.

JACKSON v. THE COMMISSIONERS OF INLAND REVENUE. (a.)

Inland revenue—Stamp duty—Separation deed—Agreement in consideration of fixed weekly payments—Duty assessable on covenant—Stamp Act, 1891 (54 & 55 Vict. c. 39), s. 4, and Schedule I.

(a.) Reported by ERSKINE REID, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

By the Schedule to the Stamp Act, 1891, a bond, covenant, or instrument of any kind whatsoever, being the only or principal or primary security for any annuity (except upon the original creation thereof by way of sale or security, and except a superannuation annuity) or for any sum or sums of money at stated periods, not being interest for any principal sum secured by a duly stamped instrument or rent reserved by a lease or tack, is chargeable if for a definite and certain period, so that the total amount to be ultimately payable can be ascertained, with the same ad valorem duty as a bond or covenant for such total amount; if for the term of life or any other indefinite period with a duty of 2*s.* 6*d. for every* £5, and also for any fractional part of £5, of the annuity or sum periodically payable.

A deed of separation entered into by the appellant and his wife contained a clause to the effect that the appellant would and should during the joint lives of himself and his wife, if his wife should continue to perform and observe the stipulations therein contained and on her part to be performed and observed, pay to his wife "the clear weekly sum of £1," and in the event of the wife surviving the appellant and not having forfeited payment during his lifetime, the sum should continue to be paid to her by her husband's representatives.

Held, that the agreement was a security for an indefinite period for a sum of money at weekly periods, and not for an annuity or yearly sum payable by weekly instalments, and was, therefore, only liable to ad valorem duty upon the sum agreed to be paid weekly, and not upon the total amount of such weekly payments for a year.

Clifford v. Commissioners of Inland Revenue, [1896] 2 Q. B. 187, 44 W. R. Dig. 76, followed.

This was a special case stated by the Commissioners of Inland Revenue, and was argued before Phillimore, J., sitting for a Divisional Court.

The facts stated were as follow: On the 14th of March, 1902, an instrument was presented on behalf of John Jackson, the appellant, to the Commissioners of Inland Revenue, under the provisions of the 12th section of the Stamp Act, 1891 (54 and 55 Vict., c. 39), for the opinion of the Commissioners as to the stamp duty with which the instrument was chargeable. The instrument in question was a deed of separation between the appellant and his wife, and contained the following clause: "The said John Jackson will and shall, during the joint lives of himself and the said Emma Jackson, if the said Emma Jackson shall continue to perform and observe the stipulations herein contained, and on her part to be performed and observed, pay to the said Emma Jackson the clear weekly sum of £1; and, in the event of the said Emma Jackson surviving the said John Jackson, and not having incurred a forfeiture of the said weekly sum in his lifetime, the same shall continue to be paid by the representatives of the said John Jackson during the remainder of the life of the said Emma Jackson. The said weekly sum shall be paid in advance on the Monday of each week, the first payment to be made on Monday, the 10th day of March instant, and the said Emma Jackson shall not have power during her covertare to anticipate the same." It was admitted by the appellant that the deed was liable under section 4 (a) of the Stamp Act, 1891, to two duties—(1) a duty of 10*s.* as a deed, and (2) an ad valorem duty by reference to the heading of charge in the first schedule to the Stamp Act, 1891, of "Bond, covenant, or instrument of any kind whatsoever." The appellant contended that the ad valorem duty payable under this latter head was to be calculated on the amount payable weekly—namely, £1—and that the above clause of the deed was a "covenant, being the only security for a sum or sums of money at stated periods," and that the sum periodically payable was £1, and the duty thereon was 2s. 6d.

The Commissioners were of opinion that the instrument was, as to the above clause, the only security for an annuity for the term of life, or at any rate for an indefinite period; that the amount of the annuity was £52, and that duty was payable at the rate of 2s. 6d. for every £5 of the said sum of £52.

They accordingly assessed the duty at £1 7s. 6d., and they assessed a further duty of 10s. in respect of other matter contained in the deed. The appellant admitted the correctness of the assessment as to the further duty of 10s., but was dissatisfied with the assessment so far as it related to the sum of £1 7s. 6d., the amount of the ad valorem duty held to be chargeable.

The questions for the court were (1) whether the instrument was chargeable with the ad valorem duty of £1 7s. 6d. in accordance with the assessment; (2) if not, with what ad valorem duty it was chargeable.

J. A. Foote, K.C., and Woodcock, for the appellant. The agreement is one for an indefinite period, it does not purport to deal with an annuity or with annual payments, and owing to the uncertainty as to the period during which the agreement may last, the parties have themselves stipulated for weekly payments. The case is covered by that of Clifford v. Commissioners of Inland Revenue, [1896] 2 Q. B. 187, 44 W. R. Dig. 76, and the duty is chargeable on the amount of the weekly sum only.

Sir R. B. Finlay, A.G. (Rowlatt with him), for the Commissioners.—The Commissioners have rightly decided, looking at the agreement as a whole, that it is one for an indefinite period and is intended to provide for a yearly sum to be paid by the husband to the wife, the actual payments being made weekly. The case is really governed by the decisions in Jones v. Commissioners of Inland Revenue and Sweetmeat Automatic Delivery Co. v. Commissioners of Inland Revenue, reported in 43 W. R. 318, [1895] 1 Q. B. 484, where instruments which provided for the payment of the consideration by quarterly payments were held to be chargeable with an ad valorem duty upon the same principle as that which has been acted on by the Commissioners here. If the contention of the appellant is right, then the shorter the periods at which payment is to be made the less will be the stamp duty, and parties to such agreements will deprive the revenue of duty by fixing payments at very short intervals.

PHILLIMORE, J.—I am unable to distinguish the present case from that of Clifford v. Inland Revenue Commissioners which has been relied on by the appellant, and therefore in my judgment this appeal must be allowed. In both cases there was the same contemplation by the parties of an endurance of the payment for more than a year, and they contemplated also the possibility that the matter might be brought to an abrupt conclusion. In the present case that latter consideration is even more patent than in Clifford's case. In both instances the actual payment was weekly. Pollock, B., and Bruce, J., who considered their judgment in Clifford's case held that there the weekly payments made the period a weekly one, and that it was not an annuity or yearly sum payable by weekly instalments, and on that authority I must hold the same in the present case. There will therefore be judgment for the appellant with costs, and the sum to be paid as ad valorem duty will be assessed at 2s. 6d.

MONK v. ARNOLD. (a.)

Factory—Provision against fire—Power of county court judge to apportion cost of safety appliances—Factory Act, 1891 (54 & 55 Vict. c. 75), s. 7.

By section 7 of the Factory Act, 1891, the use of certain safety appliances is made compulsory on the owner, but if he alleges that the tenant "ought" to bear any part of the cost he can apply to the county court judge, who is to make such order as may appear just and equitable under the circumstances.

Held, that the word "ought" was not to be construed as a word of legal liability, the Legislature intending to insure the safety of the factory and to leave it to the county court judge to do what was right between the parties.

This was an appeal by the defendant from his Honour Sir John Edge, sitting at the Clerkenwell County Court.

The plaintiff was the owner of a certain factory and the defendant was the tenant under a lease dated the 1st of November, 1897; the lease contained a covenant by the tenant to pay all rates, taxes, charges, assessments, and outgoings whatsoever, whether parliamentary, parochial, local, or of any other description, which might be assessed, charged, or imposed upon the demised premises, or the landlord or occupier in respect thereof.

By section 7, sub-section 1, of the Factory Act, 1891, every factory of which the construction is commenced after the 1st of January, 1892, and in which more than forty people are employed shall be furnished with a certificate from the sanitary authority that the factory is provided on the storeys above the ground floor with such means of escape . . . as can reasonably be required under the circumstances of the case. (2) With respect to all factories to which the foregoing provisions of this section do not apply, and in which more than forty persons are employed, it shall be the duty of the sanitary authority to ascertain, from time to time, whether all such factories are so provided . . . and in the case of any factory which is not so provided to serve a notice on the person being within the meaning of the Public Health Act, 1875, the owner of the factory a notice in writing specifying the measures necessary for providing such means of escape as aforesaid, and requiring him to carry out the same before a specified date; and thereupon such owner shall, notwithstanding any agreement with the occupier, have power to take such steps as are necessary for complying with the requirements, and unless such requirements are so complied with the owner shall be liable to a fine not exceeding one pound for every day that such noncompliance continues. . . . If the owner alleges that the occupier ought to bear or contribute to the expenses of complying with the requirements, he may apply to the county court having jurisdiction where the factory is situate, and thereupon the court, after hearing the occupier, may make such order as appears to the court just and equitable under all the circumstances."

The plaintiff having been served with an order under the Act, did the work and brought an action in the county court to recover from the defendant the sum so expended. The county court judge divided the cost between the owner and the lessee.

The defendant appealed. There was also a cross-appeal by the plaintiff, who alleged that under the terms of the covenant in the lease the defendant ought to bear the entire cost.

C. A. Russell, K.C. (Bonner with him), for the defendant.—The words of the sub-section import legal liability. The tenant ought not to bear any part of the cost unless it can be made out from the terms of my covenant. The plaintiff can still sue the defendant on the covenant in the High Court.

Dickens, K.C. (Chester Jones with him).—The county court judge was authorized by the Act to do what was right in the matter, and he has rightly exercised his discretion. On the cross-appeal I say that the words of the covenant cover the liability, and that therefore the county court judge should have ordered the tenant to pay the whole.

Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J.—In the view that we take of this case it is not necessary to deal with the question of the defendant's liability on the covenant. I think the governing consideration of this case is section 7 of the Act of 1891. The primary object of the Act was to make factories safe from fire, and to see that they were properly furnished with safety appliances. The second consideration was to get the work performed by the person who had control over the building. In the course of the passage of the Bill the cost of structural alterations in cases where the property was let on lease was adverted to, and the above-mentioned addition was accordingly made to the sub-section. Cases might arise in which it would be right to impose the whole burden on the owner or the lessee respectively. Both counsel contend that the word "ought" imports a legal obligation. Mr. Russell says that in his view the tenant ought to pay nothing, as his covenant does not impose it upon him. Mr. Dickens, on the other hand, contends that he should pay the whole. I cannot but think that the county court judge has taken the right view. I cannot think that the words in the section "may make such order as is just and equitable under all the circumstances of the case" apply only to the terms of the covenant or contract between the landlord and the tenant. In my opinion they give to the county court judge an equitable jurisdiction to apportion the amount having regard to the length of the lease, the character of the building, and other matters. Of course it is right that he should take into consideration the contract between the parties, but unless there is something in it which makes it unjust that he should apportion the amount he is given a discretion to do so. Mr. Russell says that the tenant may still be sued upon his covenant in the High Court, and that an order under this Act would not be an answer to the claim. That may be so, and it may be a casus omnissus in the Act, but I do not think that we ought therefore fail to give effect to plain words of the Act. Mr. Russell's plea therefore fails. Mr. Dickens says, then, that the covenant plainly imposes an obligation on the tenant. Even if Mr. Dickens had satisfied us as to that, the county court judge had a discretion under the section on dealing with the case, and I am of opinion that he exercised his discretion rightly. Each appeal therefore fails.

DARLING, J.—I am of the same opinion. The section was not merely meant to tell the judge to decide according to the strict legal rights of the parties, which is the ordinary duty of every judge. I think they meant something more. Many cases must arise in which if only strict legal justice were done it might not meet the full justice of the case, "To do what was just and equitable under all the circumstances of the case" one would have to go further and exercise "attributive justice," to use a somewhat technical word.

CHANNELL, J.—I agree with the judgments already delivered as to the construction of the section. In my opinion the Legislature deliberately imposed the burden of providing these fire escapes on the landlord in the first place, leaving to the county court judge a power over the contract entered into between parties. If there was an express contract by the tenant to put up these fire escapes, the judge would, of course, so order; but if there is no express contract, but some general provision, then I think that the Legislature gave the county court judge a discretion to deal with the matter. The only difficulty is Mr. Russell's point that the landlord could still sue the tenant in the High Court on his covenant, but in the view I take of the statute there is no imposition on the landlord until the county court had so held. But even if that is not so, and there is a casus omnissus, it is not, I think, sufficient to prevent us from giving the effect we do to this Act.

Appeal and cross-appeal dismissed.

DARLOW v. SHUTTLEWORTH. (a.)

Practice—Appeal—Bills of exceptions—Proceedings in error—Common Law Procedure Acts, 1852 (15 & 16 Vict. c. 76), ss. 146-167, and 1854 (17 & 18 Vict. c. 125)—Judicature Acts, 1873 (36 & 37 Vict. c. 66), s. 45, and 1884 (47 & 48 Vict. c. 61), s. 23—*R. Bills of exceptions and proceedings in error from inferior courts have been impliedly if not expressly abolished. Appeals from inferior courts must therefore be by notice of motion in the King's Bench Division in cases where there is no statute regulating the appeal. But all of substance in the old procedure must still be observed.

This was a hearing of a rule nisi obtained at the suit of the plaintiff calling upon the master of the Crown Office to show cause why an appeal should not be entered in the list. The arguments appear sufficiently from the judgment of the court.

Rowlatt showed cause.

Danckwerts (Firminger with him), in support of the rule.

THE COURT reserved judgment.

The judgment of the COURT (Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J., and DARLING and CHANNELL, JJ.) was delivered by CHANNELL, J.—In this case a rule nisi was granted calling on the master of the Crown Office to show cause why he should not be directed to enter in the list of appeals from inferior courts a notice of motion by way of appeal from a case tried in the Borough Court of Record of Preston. The notice of appeal complained of alleged misdirection by the judge of the borough court. The master of the Crown Office refused to enter the appeal on the ground that no appeal lies from the Borough Court of Preston. The rule has been argued before us; and in considering whether it should be made absolute we have to determine, shortly, whether there is now any such right of appeal, and if so in what cases. The court in question is an ancient court of record held in the borough under a charter. There is no modern Act of Parliament regulating its procedure and giving an appeal from it, as in the case of the Mayor's Court, the Liverpool Court of Passage, and the Salford Hundred Court, and possibly other similar courts. The report of the case of Addison v. The Mayor of Preston in 12 C. B. 108 may be referred to for statements as to the history and jurisdiction of the court. It is admitted that in the absence of a statute giving an appeal from the court in question to this court no appeal would lie, otherwise than by substitution for proceedings in error; but it is contended by Mr. Danckwerts, who supported the rule, that a litigant in the borough court could formerly have tendered a bill of exceptions to the ruling of the judge in case of an alleged misdirection by him, and then have brought error to the Court of King's Bench (or, indeed, at his option to the Court of Common Pleas), and that the effect of the Judicature Acts and rules is that an appeal by notice of motion is now substituted for these proceedings in error. Several of the steps in this argument are clear. It is clear that before the Judicature Acts error lay to the King's Bench from all inferior courts of record in the kingdom, and also that in all such courts a bill of exceptions to the ruling of the judge might be tendered as in the superior courts. A misdirection of the judge might, therefore, if the objection to it was duly taken by a bill of exceptions, be reviewed and set right in the Court of King's Bench by the litigant issuing a writ of error, which he could do as of right. Mr. Danckwerts quoted to us many authorities in support of these propositions, but it is unnecessary to refer to them as the law is now well settled, though not perhaps very familiar at the present day. These authorities are, however, useful upon the question which we have to consider, as to how far these various steps in these proceedings were mere machinery or were matters of substance. The Common Law Procedure Acts of 1852 and 1854 first made changes in the ancient practice, and these Acts have now to be considered. The Act of 1852 contains a number of sections, beginning with section 146, as to the forms of proceedings in error. By section 148 "a writ of error shall not be necessary or used in any cause, and the proceeding to error shall be a step in the cause." This appears not to apply to error from an inferior court, but only to causes in the superior courts. The writ of error had been practically the commencement of a new action, and by this enactment error was to be only a step in the cause. This it could not be when the proceedings on which error was brought had been taken in an inferior court, but it is of no importance in the present case whether in the period between 1852 and 1875 error from an inferior court ought to have been commenced by issuing a writ of error or by filing a memorandum with the master, as was done in the case of proceedings in error from one of the superior courts. Mr. Danckwerts is clearly right in saying that the jurisdiction of the King's Bench to entertain proceedings in error from inferior courts was part of the original or inherent jurisdiction of the court to examine or correct all errors in inferior courts (vide Coke, 4 Inst. 71), and that the writ of error was not really in the nature of a special commission under which the judges entertained the matter, as appears to have been sometimes thought. No doubt it was the writ of error which in one sense gave the jurisdiction, but only in the same way that a writ in an ordinary action is required to give jurisdiction. The other provisions of the Act of 1852 require no notice. Then came the Act of 1854, and though it did not deal directly with proceedings in error it contained enactments as to appeal to the Exchequer Chamber which proved the death-blow to bills of exception in the superior courts, as from that time they were little required, and were rarely resorted to. In the inferior courts of record the right to tender bills of exception of course remained, at least down to the time when the Judicature Acts came into operation. There are, however, few, and possibly no reported instances, of bills of exception being in use at this period—none were quoted to us in the argument, and we have not found any ourselves. But this may be accounted for by the fact that at the time we are considering, between 1852 and 1875, the new county courts had been for some time in operation, and the local courts of record themselves were very little resorted to, and in fact almost obsolete, except those courts which, like the Mayor's Court, London, had special Acts of Parliament giving appeals and rendering the resort to bills of exception as unnecessary as in the superior courts. We come now to the Judicature Acts. By section 4 of the Act of 1873 the High Court of Justice was to have such appellate jurisdiction from inferior courts "as is hereinafter mentioned," which reference appears to be the 45th section. But by section 16 the High Court of Justice expressly got all the jurisdiction of the existing Court of King's Bench, and thus clearly got the jurisdiction to deal with error from inferior courts of record. By the 45th section "all appeals from petty or quarter sessions, from a county court, or from any inferior court," are to be heard and determined by Divisional Courts. Now on this section Mr. Rowlatt, showing cause against the rule, remarked that at that date error and appeal were distinct things, and that the lawyers who framed the Judicature Act would never have included "error" in "appeal." There is some force in this, but although it is true that the two things were distinct, yet the word appeal is undoubtedly the larger and more general of the two, and in its wider sense is quite capable of including error, and when it is seen that there is neither in the Act or in the rules in the schedule, any other provision whatever as to error from an inferior court (unless perhaps the 49th rule mentioned below abolishes it), we think the more reasonable construction is to hold that the words "all appeals from inferior courts" in the 45th section include error. If this is not correct, by the 73rd section the old procedure in error would have been continued by this Act. If the 45th section does include it, the procedure would still have been the old procedure until new rules were made under the 74th section. By the 49th rule in the schedule to that Act it is said that "bills of exception and proceedings in error shall be abolished," but as this comes amongst the rules relating to procedure in the Court of Appeal it is doubtful whether proceedings in error from inferior courts were referred to; and as the Act was only dealing with the High Court, it can hardly be said that bills of exception in the inferior courts of record would have been abolished by these words. So that while there is no clear abolition by the Act of 1873 of proceedings in error from inferior courts, there is certainly no clear expression of intention to continue them either under the old form or in any new form. It is of course absolutely clear that there is in the Judicature Acts and rules, which were passed to improve procedure and enlarge jurisdiction, no indication of any intention to take away any previously existing rights of suitors, whether of originating proceedings or bringing error or appealing, without substituting new procedure for giving effect to those rights. The schedule to the Act of 1873 was repealed by the Act of 1875, but the same words, "bills of exceptions and writs of error shall be abolished" appear in ord. 58, r. 1, in the schedule to the Act of 1875, but again the words appear in conjunction with provisions relating to the Court of Appeal. The Act of 1875 contains in the 15th section an enactment that the enactments as to appeals from county courts might be extended by Order in Council to any other inferior court, and if this power had been acted upon in the case of the Preston Court it would have prevented the question before us arising; but no such Order in Council has been made, at all events as to Preston Court. Practically the Act of 1875 left all the questions we have to consider just as they were left by the Act of 1873. Nor were any rules which throw any light on the matter before us made until after the passing of the Judicature Act, 1884, which by section 23 enacted that the power to make rules conferred by section 17 of the Judicature Act, 1875, should be deemed to include power to make rules for regulating the procedure on appeals from inferior courts to the High Court. Under this Act the present rules as to appeals from inferior courts were made, including ord. 69, r. 10, that all such appeals shall be by notice of motion. This concludes the history of the matter, and gives us the material on which our decision is to be based. The result is, that unless error from inferior courts is included both in the Acts and rules under the words "appeals from inferior courts" there is no provision for it. All through these enactments and rules there is no mention whatever of "error from inferior courts," and no mention of proceedings in error at all except to abolish them; and although it is doubtful whether this express abolition relates to error from inferior courts, it is, we think, impossible not to hold that so far as the superior court and the procedure in it is concerned, the old form of proceedings in error from inferior courts is gone and the new forms of appeal are substituted for them. The High Court of Justice on its creation got the jurisdiction to entertain error from inferior courts, and that jurisdiction cannot have been lost. If the true view is that the old forms have been abolished without any clear substitution of the new forms for them, the new forms would nevertheless apply; just as it was held after the abolition of real actions that a personal action could be maintained for a matter on which previously no personal action lay: Thomas v. Sylvester, 21 W. R. 912, L. R. 8 Q. B. 368. In fact, however, the old forms appear to have gone, not so much by express abolition as by the substitution of the new forms for the old. Turning now to the cases, the only case quoted to us of error brought since the Judicature Acts from an inferior court was Le Blanche v. Reuter's Telegram Co., 25 W. R. 115, 1 Ex. Div. 408. That came from the Mayor's Court, and was brought on notice of motion to the Divisional Court for hearing appeals from inferior courts; and as the Court of Error from the Mayor's Court, prior to the Judicature Acts was the Exchequer Chamber and not the Queen's Bench, the Divisional Court held that the appeal must go to the Court of Appeal as having the jurisdiction of the Exchequer Chamber. Mellor, J., however, appears to have been clearly of opinion that "error" was abolished and "appeal" substituted. And in Pryor v. The City Offices Co., 31 W. R. 777, 10 Q. B. D. 504, Brett, M.R., seems to have been of opinion (see p. 507) that error on the face of the proceedings in the Mayor's Court was properly brought before the Court of Appeal by way of appeal. We hold, therefore, that error from an inferior court is now properly brought in the High Court by notice of motion. No difficulty arises from the abolition of the writ of error, by which proceedings in error were formerly commenced; for many matters are now commenced in the High Court without a writ—for instance, by originating summons, and county court appeals by notice of motion, and when such matters are, in accordance with the practice of the court, daly commenced without a writ there is jurisdiction to hear them.* There is a somewhat greater difficulty as to the part of the proceedings in the inferior court prior to the error coming before the High Court, particularly as the bill of exceptions. In Reg. v. Kettle, 17 Q. B. D. 762, 34 W. R. Dig. 50, a case which decided that the statutory appeal from a county court by way of special case had been abolished by the High Court rules and appeal by way of motion substituted for it, Wills, J., pointed out that the Act of 1884 was unnecessary if it was meant to authorize only rules for the part of the procedure on appeal from inferior courts which took place in the High Court, and that the power given by the Act of 1884 clearly extended to altering so much of the procedure in the county court as was merely machinery for the appeal. Again in Eder v. Levy, 19 Q. B. D. 210, 34 W. R. Dig. 152, it was held that for the old appeal from the Mayor's Court by special case in cases over £20 there was substituted an appeal by motion, and that the former mode of appeal having been as of right and without the necessity of the leave of the court below, the new appeal by motion might be made without leave, notwithstanding a section of the Mayor's Court Act, providing that appeals by motion required leave. With these cases quoted by Mr. Danckwerts, we must compare the cases quoted by Mr. Rowlatt—viz., West Devon Great Consols Mine, 36 W. R. 342, 38 Ch. D. 51; Morgan v. Bowles, 42 W. R. 269, [1894] 1 Q. B. 236; Kirby v. North British Mercantile Insurance Co. (Limited), 44 W. R. 529, [1896] 2 Q. B. 99. In the first of these cases it was held that the Judicature Acts and rules under them as to inferior court appeals had not dispensed with the necessity for a deposit as a condition of appeal under the Stannaries Act. This was put on the ground that the Stannaries Act was special legislation, and per Bowen, L.J., "generalia specialibus non derogant." In Morgan v. Bowles, it was held that the condition as to deposit imposed by section 8 of the Mayor's Court Act had not been abrogated by the new rules as to inferior court appeals. Eder v. Levy was not quoted to the court, but the two cases as reported are not necessarily inconsistent, for it does not appear by the report of Eder v. Levy that the question of deposit was raised. The two cases together bring out clearly the distinction that while matters of mere procedure for the purpose of getting the appeal before the higher court can be altered by rules, conditions—subject to which only is there a right of appeal—cannot be so altered. In Kirby v. North British Mercantile Insurance Co., a similar decision was given by the Court of Appeal as to the condition of time imposed by the same section by the Mayor's Court Act, and the court clearly held that the giving of notice in proper time and the giving of the security were conditions precedent to the existence of the right of appeal. In addition to the cases quoted to us on the argument we may refer to the case of The Attorney-General v. Sillem, 12 W. R. 641, 10 H. L. Cas. 704, in which there was both in the Exchequer Chamber and in the House of Lords a very great difference of opinion upon the question whether the Court of Exchequer, under the powers given to it by the Queen's Remembrancer Act for making rules for regulating the process, practice, and procedure of the court in revenue cases, could make rules applying the provisions of the Common Law Procedure Acts as to appeals to the decisions of the Court of Exchequer in revenue cases. It was held by a majority, both in the Exchequer Chamber and in the House of Lords, that there was no such power and that the creation of a right of appeal requires legislative authority. This decision is not in point in the present case, as no question arose there of altering an existing right of appeal by new procedure; but the judgments in both courts contain much learning on the differences between error and appeal, and as to what is procedure and practice, and what can be done by rules, all of which throws light on the question before us, and, as we think, justifies the conclusions at which we arrive. To apply these conclusions it becomes necessary whether it was formerly a condition precedent to a right of appeal, or perhaps we should say to a right to bring error in respect of a misdirection in an inferior court of record, that the party should have tendered a bill or whether tendering and getting the seal of the judge to a bill of exceptions was only machinery for the purpose of bringing the case under review in a higher court. Bills of exceptions were not known to the common law, but were introduced by 13 Edw. 1, st. 1, c. 31 (1285), and as appears from Coke's 2nd Inst., p. 426 the statute was applied in practice (though it did not in express terms extend) to all courts of record, and the case of Thompson v. Davenport, 2 Sm. L. C., 10th ed., p. 368, is one of several reported instances of error in a bill of exceptions from an inferior court being entertained. The object of the bill of exceptions was to put the matter complained of on the record. Then the right to bring error followed. It must be tendered before verdict, and it was held by Holt, C.J., in Wright v. Sharp, 1 Salk. 288, that though it need not be drawn up in form at the time it is tendered, yet, as it is to become a record, the substance of it should be reduced into writing while the thing is transacting. When sealed by the judge both parties were concluded by it as to the truth of the matters contained in it: Tidd's Practice (9th ed.), p. 864. The bill of exceptions was, therefore, if procedure, certainly procedure of an important character; but in many points it much resembled a special case signed by the judge at the request of the parties for the purpose of an appeal. As it has been held in Reg. v. Kettle and Eder v. Levy that the statement of a special case was not a condition precedent to the right of appeal from the county court and from the Mayor's Court, but was procedure only, and was abolished by the new procedure, we think that we ought not to hold that the actual tendering of a bill of exceptions and getting it sealed is now a condition precedent to the right to bring under review in a superior court the matters which could have been so brought by taking that course. We ought to hold that the bill of exceptions was form only, abolished now, either expressly, or if not, then abolished by the substitution of new forms. At the same time we must hold that all which was matter of substance in the old form is still a condition precedent to the new appeal. The misdirection must be of a character which could be the subject of a bill of exceptions, and the old authorities on that subject would apply, and, further, the objection must have been taken distinctly and brought to the judge's attention before verdict. It may be that this latter requirement adds little, if anything, to what the House of Lords has laid down in the case of Smith v. Baker, 40 W. R. 392, [1891] A. C. 325, is always required on an appeal from an inferior court. Further, if there were any conditions as to bail or otherwise, which were conditions precedent to the right to bring error, they will still be conditions precedent to the right to appeal: Kirby v. North British Mercantile Insurance Co. It rather seems that bail in error was only required as a condition of a stay in execution, and not of a right to bring error (19 Geo. 3, c. 70, s. 5, and 7 & 8 Geo. 4, c. 71, s. 6), but that, and any other question of non-compliance with conditions precedent to the existence of the right to appeal in this case, we must leave open to the argument of the appeal. Neither the notice of motion in the case before us nor the affidavit in support of the rule, shows that there was in fact anything analogous to the tender of a bill of exceptions, but that is probably owing to the fact that, until Mr. Danckwerts was instructed no one had seen that the only way to support the appeal was as a substitute for error on a bill of exceptions. The notice of motion was refused in the Crown Office on the broad ground that no appeal lay in any case; and we think we ought to direct the appeal to be entered, and the appellant will have, as in a county court appeal, to show at the hearing that he took the point of law sufficiently, and took it in time. As to the materials on which the appeal has to be heard there may be some difficulty, and it may be that it will be found desirable to make some further rules of court as to appeals from inferior courts in substitution for proceedings in error; but if the rules are defective on this point it does not create any difficulty as to the jurisdiction to entertain the appeal, as ord. 59, r. 8, does, however imperfectly, provide for the case. We think that the rule must be made absolute. Of course it is not a case for costs, as cause was only shown against the rule on behalf of the recorder with a view no doubt of assisting the court, and we are indebted to counsel on both sides for the assistance given to the court in a matter of some difficulty, and which required considerable research.

REX v. PENFOLD AND ANOTHER. (a.)

Criminal law — Evidence of previous convictions — Admissibility of at trial—Prevention of Crimes Act, 1871 (34 & 35 Vict. c. 112), s. 7.

Where the evidence of previous convictions is necessary in order to constitute a statutory offence, evidence of such convictions may be given at the trial of the prisoner.

Rex v. Brown, 65 J. P. 136, overruled.

Case stated by Mr. Loveland, K.C., deputy-chairman of the London Sessions.

In this case the question was raised as to the power of receiving evidence of previous convictions in certain statutory offences created under the Prevention of Crimes Act, 1871 (34 & 35 Vict. c. 11), s. 7, the material words of which are, "Where any person is convicted on indictment of a crime, and a previous conviction of a crime is proved against him he shall at any time within seven years immediately after the expiration of the sentence passed on him for the last of such crimes be guilty of an offence against this Act, and be liable to imprisonment, with or without hard labour, for a term not exceeding one year under the following circumstances or any of them . . . Thirdly, if he is found in any place, whether public or private, under such circumstances as to satisfy the court before whom he is brought that he was about to commit a felony or to aid in the commission of any offence punishable on indictment or summary conviction, or was waiting for an opportunity to commit or aid in the commission of any offence punishable on indictment or summary conviction."

From the case it appeared that the defendants James Penfold and George Edwards were convicted on an indictment under the above section, the indictment charging them with having been in Goswell-square and Northampton-square in such circumstances as to show that they were about to commit a felony, they having been previously convicted of felony, and within seven years of their previous convictions.

On being charged at the police-court they elected to go before a jury. At the trial Mr. Kershaw, for the Crown, proposed to call a witness without mentioning to the jury for what purpose, and he contended that under the Prevention of Crimes Act, 1871, s. 7, the evidence of the proposed witness was necessary before an indictable offence could be made out, meaning that the offence could not be proved until evidence had been given of the previous convictions, it being no offence by itself to be found in a place in such circumstances about to commit an offence. Mr. Burnie, for the defendants, argued that there were two issues, and that the jury must be satisfied that the defendants were about to commit an offence under section 7 of the Act, and that after the jury were so satisfied previous convictions should be proved. He drew attention to section 7 of the Act incorporating the rules contained in the Larceny Act, 1861, s. 116, and he cited Rex v. Brown, 65 J. P. 136, which is to the effect that in such a case previous convictions may not be proved before the jury until the other facts constituting the subsequent offence have been found by them. Mr. Kershaw, in reply, contended that section 7 did not apply, as the offence was not within the definitions set out in section 20 of the Prevention of Crimes Act. In Reg. v. Floyd, 56 J. P. 713, before Sir Peter Edlin, the indictment was in similar terms, and there was a second term for attempted housebreaking and the judge deprecated adding a second count as the jury in trying the first count would become aware of the previous convictions.

Bearing in mind the previous practice, the deputy-chairman admitted the evidence. The jury found both prisoners guilty, but sentence was deferred. The question for the opinion of the court was whether the evidence was properly received in the hearing of the jury for the purpose of proving the offence under the Act.

Henry Sutton appeared for the prosecution.

The defendants were not represented.

Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J.—In this case it appears there has been some doubt as to the practice in cases of trial by indictment for offences under section 7 of the Prevention of Crimes Act, 1871. In cases where there is a subsequent crime charged, and that crime is complete in itself, but different degrees of punishment may be inflicted according to the antecedents of the prisoner, evidence of the previous conviction ought not to be given until the subsequent charge has been proved. To prevent any difficulty, section 116 of the Larceny Act, 1861, was passed, which enacts that the offender shall in the first instance be arraigned on so much of the indictment as charges the subsequent offence, and after that inquiry is concluded—not before—that he shall be asked whether he had been previously convicted. Section 7 of the Prevention of Crimes Act, 1871, provides that a combination of circumstances shall create an offence which would be no offence at all but for the offender having been previously convicted within a certain limit of time. The indictment here alleges all the necessary ingredients of the offence. If these men had been tried before the magistrates the whole story must have been gone into, and the previous convictions must have been proved; but the prisoners claimed a jury. In my opinion, where the offence is made a statutory offence and requires the ingredients to constitute it which are stated in the section, it is right that those ingredients should be proved in evidence whatever be the tribunal before which it should be tried. I am clearly of opinion that the judge was right in allowing the previous convictions to be proved, and the convictions must be affirmed. Our judgment, of course, overrules the judgment of the recorder in Rex v. Brown.

WRIGHT, J.—I agree.

RIDLEY, J.—I agree.

BIGHAM, J.—I agree. I think it is sufficient to say that this evidence was necessary to prove the offence and therefore was admissible.

WALTON, J.—I agree.

Conviction affirmed.

Criminal law—Evidence—Statement of affairs—24 & 25 Vict. c. 96, ss. 80, 85—Bankruptcy Act, 1890 (53 & 54 Vict. c. 71), s. 27.

A statement of affairs made by a bankrupt in the course of bankruptcy is admissible as evidence against him on a charge of misappropriation, and does not come within the protection afforded by section 27 of the Bankruptcy Act of 1890.

The following are the facts of the case:

William Good Pike was tried at the Worcester Assizes on the 22nd of December, 1901, being charged in two counts under 24 & 25 Vict. c. 96, s. 80, with having unlawfully converted and appropriated to his own use certain sums of money, of which, under the will of William Ayre, deceased, he was trustee, for the benefit of his brother's (Samuel Robert Pike) three children. The jury found the prisoner guilty. In the course of the trial Mr. Lawrence tendered in evidence the prisoner's statement of affairs in bankruptcy, which showed the receipt of the moneys in question. The statement of affairs was the statutory one made in the course of bankruptcy and verified by oath before the assistant official receiver and filed by the assistant official receiver in accordance with the provisions of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 54), s. 16, and General Rule 217. Mr. Mathews objected to the receipt of this evidence on the ground that it was evidence which was rendered inadmissible by 24 & 25 Vict. c. 96, s. 85, as amended by the Bankruptcy Act, 1890 (53 & 54 Vict. c. 71), s. 27. He based his contention upon the words contained in section 27, sub-section 2 of the Act of 1890, which provides that an admission made by any person in any compulsory examination shall not be admissible in evidence against that person in any proceeding in respect of any of the misdemeanours referred to in section 85 of 24 & 25 Vict. c. 96. His lordship overruled the objection and sentenced the prisoner to three years' penal servitude, but stated a case. The question for the opinion of the court was whether the convictions should stand.

J. B. Mathews, for the prisoner.—The examination is compulsory and therefore the section applies. The word examination does not necessarily mean a series of questions.

He cited Green v. Lord Penzance, 30 W. R. 218, 6 App. Cas. 657; and In re Mysore West Mining Co. (Limited), 37 W. R. 794, 42 Ch. D. 534.

Lawrence, K.C. (Munroe with him), for the prosecutor.—There is a broad distinction between the compulsory examination on which the debtor can be cross-examined and the statement of affairs which is to be made as a matter of course. [He was stopped by the court.]

THE COURT affirmed the conviction.

Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J.—We are all of opinion that this evidence is admissible. The prisoner was charged with having misappropriated trust funds. As part of the proof of their receipt, his statement of affairs made by him in the course of his bankruptcy was put in. Mr. Mathews contended that because it was the debtor's duty to make a true statement, it was therefore inadmissible. I think that the words in section 27, "in any compulsory examination or deposition before any court on the hearing of any matter in bankruptcy" were primâ facie intended to protect the debtor where he was being cross-examined, or had made a deposition on which he could be cross-examined. Mr. Mathews said that one must connect the hearing and the questions that might be put to him on the public compulsory examination with the statement on which he might be questioned, and that, therefore, the statement was part of the hearing. I think if that had been intended that different language would have been used. I am of opinion that the statement filed by the bankrupt in pursuance of his duty under the Bankruptcy Act was not a statement made by him within the words of the section 27.

WRIGHT, J.—I agree, but it may be right to alter the law. This is a certain unfairness in using a man's compulsory admission against him, and there is the chance that he will not make a full admission if it can be used against him.

RIDLEY, J.—I agree

BIGHAM, J.—I agree. I think it enough to say that this is not a deposition made in the hearing of any bankruptcy matter.

WALTON, J.—I agree.

LORD ADVOCATE v. STEWART AND ANOTHER. (a.)

Inland revenue—Estate tail—Scotch testator—Money to be laid out in the purchase of land in England—Discretion—Finance Act, 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. c. 30), s 23.

Where a testator gave a sum of money in trust for the purpose of purchasing land in Scotland to be entailed in accordance with the directions of his will, and by codicil authorized his trustees (if in their discretion they should think it desirable) in place of purchasing land in Scotland to purchase land in England to be entailed according to English law.

Held, that the money, or so much of it as for the time being remained uninvested in land, was not "entailed estate" within the meaning of the provisions of the Finance Act, 1894, applicable to Scotland.

Appeal from a judgment of the First Division of the Court of Session in Scotland, 38 Sc. L. Rep. 318, which reversed that of the Lord Ordinary.

The respondents were the trustees of the late James Sprot, who died in 1882, and by his will left £100,000 to be applied by his trustees in the purchase of lands which were to be entailed on his nephew, and a series of heirs. Until the purchase should be made, and the entail executed, the income or rents, as the case might be, were to be paid to the nephew, E. W. Sprot, whom failing, to the substitutes of entail.

The trustees spent part of the sum in the purchase of the estate of Drygrange, and they conveyed that estate to Mr. E. W. Sprot and the substitutes of entail in 1888.

E. W. Sprot died on the 1st of February, 1898, at which date there remained unexpended a balance of about £60,000, which was still held in trust for the purchase of lands, in terms of Mr. James Sprot's will.

On the death of E. W. Sprot, his son succeeded to Drygrange, and to the income of the entailed money.

Estate duty and settlement duty were paid on Drygrange in February and September, 1899.

Estate duty was also paid on the unexpended balance of £60,000, but it was contended that this payment was made in error, and they reclaimed it from the Crown.

Settlement estate duty, in respect of the entailed money, was claimed as due under the Finance Act, 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. c. 30), but was refused, and an action claiming account and payment was thereupon raised.

The Lord Ordinary, was of opinion that this money was "entailed estate" within the meaning of the Act, but the First Division took an opposite view.

The testator by codicil authorized his trustees in their discretion to purchase land in England, to be entailed according to English law.

Asher, D.F., Campbell Lorimer (both of the Scotch Bar), and R. G. Seton, for the respondents.

Earl of HALSBURY, L.C.: I do not think it necessary in this case to say more than this—that the question is whether a sum of money resulting in a balance from certain investments in Scotland is or is not entailed estate within the meaning of the Scottish Finance Act. I suppose that no one, apart from some interpretation clause, would say that it was entailed estate, nor do I think it important to consider that the Court of Chancery in this country, when money has been irrevocably devoted to the purchase of land, may apply to it the considerations which would apply to it if it were land itself. The questions which have been argued in the Scottish courts have been applied only to the first hypothesis which I have suggested, and the division of opinion appears to have been on the question whether a technical phraseology applicable to Finance Acts is supposed to run through all the Finance Acts when they are enacted to be read together, or whether the technical phraseology is only to be so interpreted as to belong to the particular statute in which it is found. I hesitate to express any opinion on that question, because I think it inaccurate to say that that question arises here. The sum which was devoted by a trust in the first instance for purchasing land in Scotland to be entailed in accordance with the directions of the testator's will, was materially altered from the disposition originally made, by a codicil to his will, the effect of which never seems to have been suggested as influencing the discussion to which I have referred in the Scottish courts. To my mind it has completely altered the question. The codicil permitted the money in trust to be invested at the discretion of the trustees, in England to which, of course, the interpretation clause of the Scottish Act does not attach. That discretion and the consequence of it appears to me to dispose of the argument, and I am prepared, therefore, to move that the appeal be dismissed, though, as I have said, without determining the question which appears to have been decided by the Scottish courts without reference to the matter to which I have referred.

Lord MACNAGTEN.—The question in this case is whether the unexpended balance of the estate of Mr. James Sprot, who died on the 5th of May, 1882, is or is not "property held under entail" and "entailed estate" within the meaning of the Finance Act, 1894, as applied to Scotland. Mr. James Sprot, by a trust disposition dated the 17th of May, 1879, gave a large sum of money, afterwards reduced by a codicil to the sum of £100,000, in trust for the purpose of purchasing land in Scotland to be entailed in accordance with the directions of his will. The Lord Ordinary held that the unexpended balance of this sum (now about £60,000) was "entailed estate." The First Division, on appeal, held that it was not. Unfortunately the attention of neither court was called to the provisions of the codicil of the 17th of May, 1879, which authorizes the trustees (if in their discretion they should think it desirable), in place of purchasing land in Scotland to purchase land in England to be entailed according to English law. The effect of this codicil was that the money was no longer dedicated to the sole purpose of purchasing lands in Scotland to be entailed according to the law of that country, and therefore it seems to me impossible to hold that the money, or so much of it as for the time being remains uninvested in land, comes within the meaning of the expression "entailed estate" in the provisions of the Finance Act applicable to Scotland. Under the directions of the codicil the trust to purchase lands in Scotland ceased to be imperative. On this ground I think that the decision of the First Division must be upheld. Inasmuch, however, as the question on which the courts in Scotland were divided was argued at length at the Bar, it seems to me that it would not be right to pass it over in silence. On this point I am inclined to agree with the Lord Ordinary, for the reasons which will be stated presently by Lord Robertson. It seems to me that when you have to construe a technical expression introduced into the legal vocabulary by a series of statutes forming one code, you naturally turn to the code for light and help. The key to the true meaning of the expression will, I think, be found in the latest development of legislation rather than in its earliest effort. I think that the appeal must be dismissed with costs.

Lord SHAND.—My Lords: I am of opinion that as the testator has provided that his money may be invested in England to be entailed according to the law in England, it cannot be said that this makes the property entailed estate within the meaning of the Finance Act, 1894, as applicable in its provisions to Scotland. But I must add that, apart from the provision of the codicil of 1879, I should arrive at the same result, for I agree with the views expressed by the First Division of the court in reversing the judgment of the Lord Ordinary. The question is one of difficulty having regard to the provisions of the Entail Acts of 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 61) and 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 53), but I find nothing in these statutes which makes money directed to be invested in the purchase of land "entailed estate" in the ordinary acceptance and meaning of that term, or anything which can be held to enact that the words "entailed estate" shall, except for a defined and limited purpose, be held to include such money, which is otherwise personal estate. Such money is not entailed. It is money which, in the first place, must be converted into land, for money does not admit of being entailed. Again, even after land has been purchased, it does not become entailed estate till the land purchased has been entailed by a deed of strict entail, which has been duly registered as such in the appropriate register of entails. In this case lands were not even acquired, much less entailed by the necessary deed duly registered. The direction to convert the money into land and to entail the land did not, and, as I think, could not, entail the money, which remained purely personal estate, though directed to be used in a particular way. What, then, is the effect of the provisions of the entail statutes? Not, I think, to convert personalty to realty, and to entail that realty by enactment, but merely that for the purposes of these statutes in disentailing and otherwise providing that the property of entailed proprietors may, with the requisite consent of expectant heirs, be made free from the restrictions of entails, money which has been directed to be converted and employed in the purchase of lands to be entailed shall be treated as if these directions had been carried out and lands had been bought and entailed. In short, that the entire estate, land entailed, and money, shall be treated in the same way and under the same conditions as one estate. I agree in the judgment of the First Division that the statutes enact only that in these statutes, and only for the purpose of these statutes in their provisions (which are really intended and calculated to break down entails and not to enforce or enlarge their provisions), money which is there called "entailed money" shall be regarded as "entailed estate." The words of the statute of 1882, are that "In this Act" the following words shall have the meanings hereby assigned to them, and the enactment to that limited effect is made very properly to apply to the proceeds of entailed land which has been sold, and money ordered to be invested in land to be entailed, which money is made subject to the same provisions for obtaining freedom from the fetters of the entail as the entailed lands themselves. There is no such general provision, and one could scarcely conceive of such a provision that, in all circumstances—e.g., in contracts and in all future statutes—the words "entailed estate" shall include in their meaning money directed to be converted into land to be thereafter entailed. The Entail Act of 1875 does not seem to be in any way different in the effect of its provisions from the Act of 1882. On the whole, then, I am of opinion that the words "entailed estate" in the Finance Act of 1894 must be taken in their ordinary and proper signification as referring to an estate which has been entailed, and not to money intended and directed to buy lands to be entailed, and that the latter entail statutes give a wider meaning to these words only where used in these statutes, and only for the special purpose of making such money liable to be dealt with, as the lands really entailed may be dealt with, under the general provisions of the statute.

Lord BRAMPTON concurred in the judgment of the Lord Chancellor.

Lord ROBERTSON.—The proposition maintained by the appellant, affirmed by the Lord Ordinary, and negatived by the First Division, is that money held in trust and directed to be laid out in land to be strictly entailed is entailed estate in the sense of the Finance Act, 1894. Subject to one limitation, that proposition seems to me to be sound; but the limitation, in my opinion, excludes from the proposition the money now in dispute. In order to be entailed estate in the sense of the Finance Act, the money must be directed to be laid out in land to be strictly entailed according to the Scotch law of entail, and therefore in Scotland. This, as it seems to me, is not merely the necessary condition of the doctrine maintained by the appellant, but is its foundation, and without it the doctrine seems to me to have no support at all. Yet this condition renders the doctrine inapplicable to the appellant's case. His whole argument (which I think sound) is founded on Scotch statutes which form part of the land laws of Scotland, and have no application to land or to entails outside Scotland. But it turns out that in a due exercise of the discretion of the trustees who hold this money it need never go into Scotch land at all. In order to show the limitation of the doctrine in question it is necessary to examine its origin and ascertain its merits. No one has denied that the only power to execute an entail, using that word in the only operative sense of the term, must be found in the Act of 1685, or has asserted that under that statute you can entail money. I fully allow that this is a good beginning to the argument against the appellant; and the statute of 1685 is regarded by the First Division as the proper criterion of the meaning of the words in question. Again, it is quite true, as far as it goes, that all the entail statutes subsequent to 1685 have gone towards breaking down rather than towards constructing entails. But when from this fact the inference is drawn that those statutes are unlikely to contain the means of determining the scope of the term entailed estate my assent is less readily given. We are in search of the sense in which those words are used in a statute in 1894; the vocabulary of that day is to be looked to, and if, as is the case, the words entailed estate and their equivalents are now in fact more in use in relation to relaxing than to constructing entails, that does not invalidate the criterion to which appeal is made. The purpose for which men speak of a thing is immaterial if they have occasion to speak of it. Now the case of the appellant is that in 1894 the word "entailed" had come to be applied to moneys which stood in certain relations to entailed land, either as being its proceeds and standing under the same trusts or as destined and held in trust for the purchase of land to be entailed. I think that this is true in point of fact, and I must say that I think that the Act of 1882, let alone the Act of 1875, demonstrates this. The 27th section declares that the price of an entailed estate shall be entailed estate within the meaning of the entail Acts; the 28th assumes (which is even more than asserting) that an entailed estate may consist of money, and that this assumption is not rested on the 27th section is manifest, for the 28th is applying the provisions of the 27th to other entailed estates than those which fall under its terms. Not less significant is the use, without any explanation or apology, of the words "entailed money" in both the 4th and the 5th sub-sections of section 23. The Act of 1882 has this double significance in the present question—it was in 1894 the latest expression of the Legislature on Scotch entail (and there is none since 1894), and it gathers up and brings together all the preceding statutes. But when we go seven years back, to the Act of 1875, we find that the term entailed estate had been already expressly extended to include all money held in trust for the purposes of being entailed. Now I am willing to assume, as is quite justly pointed out, that this is (and it could hardly be otherwise) for the purposes of that Act (observing only that the same criticism can hardly be applied to the Act of 1882 in view of its 2nd section). But the Act of 1875 covers a large area of the law of entail, and accordingly the use in their wider sense of the words "entailed estate" became from 1875 onwards correspondingly frequent, and made the additional sanction and stimulus given to that use in 1882 all the more decisive. If, as the learned counsel for the appellant invited us to do, we observe the progress of legal thought antecedent to 1875 as illustrated in judicial decisions, we see evidence that the working of the earlier of the modern entail Acts, particularly that of 1848, had fully prepared men dealing with those matters to call moneys so situated (as they were, in fact, being treated) "entailed estate." Accordingly the legislative appellation or description in the Acts of 1875 and 1882 of such moneys as "entailed estate" is not a case of the Legislature calling one thing by the name of another, but is a recognition of the fact that for practical purposes those moneys had come to possess the attributes of entailed lands, so far as such now remained. This topic might be more fully developed, but the matter does not admit of dispute. What I deduce from these considerations is that if the existing state of the law, especially as exhibited in its most unmistakable form, legislation, be the proper criterion of the meaning of words descriptive of legal rights, "entailed estate" did in 1894 include moneys directed to be applied in purchase of lands to be entailed. The principle that in statutes words are to be taken in their legal sense has, as Lord Stormonth Darling points out, a special cogency when the words in question represent only legal conceptions. The popular use of such words does not represent the primary meaning of the words, but some half understanding of them. I say this because I observe that in the judgment delivered by Lord McLaren some reliance is placed on the "ordinary use of language." Now, it seems to me that this would prove too much in the present case. If the phrase in question represents anything definite in popular use, I suspect the meaning is determined quite as much by a misuse of the word "estate" as equivalent to landed property as by any intelligent use of the word "entailed," and that popular use would reject the words if applied to anything else than a landed property. Yet it is perfectly certain that other estate than landed property may be the subject of entail, as, for instance, a right to salmon fishing. In what I have hitherto said it has been assumed that the words to be construed in the Finance Act are "entailed estate," and that the Act itself gives no further aid in the construction of that term. This, however, is to understate the appellant's case. The words directly descriptive of "settled property" (which is the appellation under which the respondents seek to claim exemption) are those in the 14th sub-section of section 23—"The expression 'settled property' shall not include property held under entail"; and then in sub-section 15 occurs the phrase "entailed estate," manifestly used as equivalent to what is in sub-section 14—the indefinite article "an" entailed estate being inserted because the form of illustration postulates an individual estate in relation to an individual proprietor. The matter, however, may be brought to a much sharper point. In the face of the express and direct enactments in the Acts of 1875 and 1882 which I have cited, I am at a loss to see how it can be affirmed of money directed to be applied in purchase of land to be entailed that it is not entailed estate, at least in some sense and to some effect. And if this be so, then quomodo constat that it is not in the sense of this Finance Act? I have not myself realised in what sense it is not entailed estate except that some of the many provisions about entails do not apply to it. But this, again, proves a good deal too much. Some of the empowering entail Acts assert that it would be for the public benefit if villages were built on entailed estates. Now exactly the same reasoning as the respondent advanced would deduce from this that salmon fishings do not fall within the scope of the entail Acts, because you cannot build villages on salmon fishings or the right to salmon fishings. But when we are told that, at all events, a Finance Act cannot be supposed to view as entailed estate moneys situated as those which I have been considering, I completely fail to see the reason. Even if a more rationalistic method be applied than is permissible in taxing Acts, I should have thought that, in a definition, section 23 (14), the object of which is to distinguish something from settled property, the subject-matter of the rights, as land or money, was very much less relevant than the quality and correlation of the rights in that subject-matter; and, so far as these are concerned, it is just because they are practically identical in the one case and in the other, that land and money are now massed under the common denomination entailed estate. From the somewhat detailed examination now made of the question argued in the Court of Session it is at least apparent that the argument of the appellant begins and ends in the Scotch entail statutes. The third section of the Act of 1875, which puts at its sharpest the appellant's contention, requires that money in order to be entailed estate must be "invested in trust for the purpose of purchasing land to be entailed." The whole theory of the identification of such money with land is that it is directed and destined to be put into land, and its inevitable fate is merely anticipated in order to prevent circuity of procedure. But if, instead of it being so inevitably destined, the trustees may or may not so apply it, the whole ratio of those enactments is gone. Now it seems to me that the combined effect of Mr. Sprot's will and his first codicil was simply to make it discretionary and optional to the trustees whether they bought Scotch land or bought English land, and the mere circumstance that the will "directed" Scotch land to be bought has no effect at all in saving that direction from being reduced to an option by the codicil. The appellant vainly endeavoured to save the situation by relying on the direction to "entail" whether the land was in Scotland or in England. But an English entail is one thing and a Scotch entail is another. And the whole argument of the appellant on the main question rests, not on the word entail, but on statutes which have no application to England. On this sole ground I am of opinion that the appeal must fail.

DOUGLAS v. SANDER & CO. (a.)

Natal, Law of—Fraud—Prescription—Roman-Dutch law.

Where the same fraud which has induced a contract has also operated to deprive a plaintiff of his other remedies, the actio doli is still open to him, and under the Roman-Dutch law for the general period of prescription, which is thirty years.

Appeal from an order of the Supreme Court of Natal, which had reversed a decision of the Circuit Court of Durban.

The facts are given in their lordships' judgment.

Hume Williams, K.C., and Arnold Statham, for the appellant.

Loehnis, for the respondents.

The judgment of their lordships (Lords MACNAGHTEN, DAVEY, ROBERTSON, LINDLEY, and Sir FORD NORTH) was delivered by Lord ROBERTSON.—On the 14th of May, 1897, the respondents, who were carriers at Durban, in the colony of Natal, sold to the appellant the whole of their business and plant for £4,400. The appellant took possession of and carried on the business in the buildings which had been occupied by the respondents for that purpose. Those buildings were held by the respondents under a lease from one Acutt, and it had been been contemplated that the appellant should take over the lease. Owing to the disputes out of which the appeal has arisen, this was never done; and Acutt compelled payment from the respondents of the rent due for the period of the appellant's occupation. On the 2nd of April, 1900, the respondents sued the appellant to recover the sum thus paid by them; and in answer to this suit the appellant made, in reconvention, a claim for £750 as damages. The present appeal relates solely to this claim in reconvention; and no question is raised as to the merits of the principal suit. On the 3rd of August, 1900, the judge of the Durban Circuit Court gave judgment in the appellant's favour for £600. On the 2nd of November, 1900, the Supreme Court of the colony reversed this judgment and disallowed the claim. The present appeal is to have the Circuit Court's judgment restored. The appellant's demand is clearly set out in his claim in reconvention, and is expressly made for damages for fraud. The fraud alleged consisted in a false statement by Franz Sander, one of the partners of the respondents' firm, which statement induced the appellant to enter into the contract of sale of the 14th of May, 1897, whereby he suffered damage. The statement made by Sander was that no post-mortem examination had been held of any horse belonging to the respondents, whereas the fact was that such a post-mortem examination had, to the knowledge of Sander, been held and had proved the horses of the respondents' establishment to be infected with glanders, at the time of the negotiations for the sale. This disease, having, by that time, got hold of the stables, again broke out in the time of the appellant's occupation and caused a loss in horses amounting to the sum of damages claimed. The answer made by the respondents to this claim was that at the time of the sale of the business and plant, the appellant was well aware that sickness had occurred among the horses, that several animals had been shot and that a post-mortem had been held which clearly "established the existence of the disease called glanders." On all the questions raised by the pleadings the evidence was highly conflicting, but at their lordships' bar the conflict was greatly narrowed by the admission of the respondents that Sander did make to the appellant the false statement that no post-mortem examination had been held, although he had, in fact, been present at a post-morten examination, and knew that it revealed glanders. The sole question therefore came to be whether in fact the appellant knew before the bargain that there had been glanders in the stable in 1897. If he did, then plainly the false statement did not induce the contract. The appellant had for some time prior to the bargain in question acted as manager for Benningfield & Co., who were carriers at Durban, and had, besides, business concerns at Johannesburg. The respondents' firm consisted of Franz Sander, whose fraud is the central fact in the case, and R. H. Tatham. Their lordships consider that the evidence justifies the conclusion of the judges who heard the witnesses, and they hold that the appellant had no independent knowledge preventing his accepting the statement made by Tatham, his vendor, according to Tatham's own testimony. This conclusion is supported by the admission of Sander that the price paid was a high price, and one which he for his part would not have given if he had known there were glanders in the stable. On a specific point made by the respondents about a notice of the outbreak appearing in a local newspaper, their lordships have no reason to reject the explanation given by the appellant and accepted by the Circuit Court that he was at Johannesburg at the time and did not see it. The incredulity expressed by the Supreme Court does not rest on any positive basis, and has no affirmative evidence to support it, having regard to the desperate position of both Tatham and Sander as witnesses of credit.

The respondents, however, have maintained an argument against the present claim which is independent of testimony. They say that the appellant has lost his remedy, and that the present claim is untenable in Roman-Dutch law. Shortly stated, the argument is as follows: In Roman law a person induced by fraud to enter a contract may elect to set aside the contract by the actio redhibitoria, in which case he may sue within six months, or he may sue in an action quanti minoris to recover the difference between what he ought to have had and what he has had, in which case he must sue within twelve months. The appellant, say the respondents, was in this case; according to his own showing, he might have had either action, and he has sued in neither. What he has done is to sue in an actio doli (or action of deceit), but this remedy is only given to those to whom no other action was ever available; and that, as already pointed out, is not the case of the appellant. Now, assuming that the question is to be determined exactly as if it had occurred in Rome and before the praetor, one important qualification must be made of the doctrine thus stated. In the chapter in the Digest De Dolo Malo, it is indeed laid down that if another action had been open to the plaintiff the actio doli must be refused. But the text goes on to give the reason—sibi imputet that he has not a remedy—"qui agere supersedit," and then it is added, "nisi in amittenda actione dolum malum passus est." It thus appears that if the same fraud which has induced the contract also operates to deprive the plaintiff of his other remedies, the praetor will give the actio doli. This is the same as saying that if the plaintiff only discovers the fraud more than a year after the bargain, the actio doli is open to him. Now, their lordships are satisfied that this is the case of the appellant. He says, and their lordships believe, that he only learned in August, 1898, of the post-mortem examination and of the fact of glanders, and that was more than a year after the date of the sale. The actio doli would thus be open to the appellant even on pure Roman law as administered by the praetor. To the objection that the actio doli was itself limited to two years, the Supreme Court give the answer that in Roman-Dutch law the Roman rule has been departed from in favour of the general prescription of thirty years; and their lordships see no reason to question this conclusion. On these grounds the action is defensible and the decree given by the Circuit Court was right. Their lordships think it right, however, to add that they do not desire to assert as on their own authority that an action of deceit in Natal will only lie under the conditions stated in the texts of the Roman law. The argument at their lordships' bar on this matter was, to say the least, not copious; and no reference was made to authorities more modern than Van Leeuwen. On such an argument they would be reluctant to stereotype according to ancient procedure what is a matter of practice affecting mercantile transactions, the more especially as the reluctance of the praetor to grant the actio doli was expressly rested on the ground that it was actio famosa, involving infamy to the person against whom fraud was proved. This consequence would not follow a successful action of deceit in Natal; and it is impossible to avoid asking whether this chapter of the Roman texts is part of the living Roman-Dutch law, and whether the action of deceit is hampered for those obsolete reasons, the more especially seeing that in the comparatively modern work of Van Linden an action of damages is spoken of as the normal remedy for fraud inducing a contract. In the meantime it is not necessary to enter on these questions, for the present case admits of decision on grounds consistent with the archaic procedure invoked. Their lordships will humbly advise his Majesty that the judgment of the Supreme Court ought to be reversed, with costs, and the judgment of the Circuit Court of Durban restored. The respondents will pay the costs of the appeal.

HUGHES v. PUMP HOUSE HOTEL CO. (LIMITED) (No. 2). (a.)

Practice—Parties—Substitution of plaintiff—Bonâ fide mistake—Ord. 16, r. 2.

The plaintiff in an action to recover a balance due under a building contract had executed an assignment of all moneys due or to become due to him under the contract. On the trial of the preliminary question whether the assignment was such as to bar the plaintiff's right of action, the judge held that it was not an absolute assignment, and that the action might proceed, but the Court of Appeal held that it was an absolute assignment, and that therefore the plaintiff had no cause of action. In an application to substitute the assignees as plaintiffs in the action,

Held, that, as it was clear that there had been a bonâ fide mistake of law, there was jurisdiction under ord. 16, r. 2, to substitute the assignees as plaintiffs.

Application for leave to appeal from an order of Channell, J., at chambers.

The action was brought by a builder to recover a balance alleged to be due under a building contract.

The plaintiff having executed an instrument in writing whereby for a certain consideration he assigned to Lloyds Bank (Limited) all moneys due or to become due to him from the defendants under the building contract, a preliminary point of law was directed to be tried—viz., whether the assignment was such as to bar the plaintiff's right to maintain the action.

Wright, J., held that the assignment was not an absolute assignment within the meaning of section 25, sub-section 6, of the Judicature Act, 1873, but was by way of charge only, and he therefore decided that the action might proceed.

The Court of Appeal reversed the decision of Wright, J., holding that the assignment was an absolute assignment not purporting to be by way of charge only, and that the plaintiff therefore had no right of action, ante, p. 660, where the facts of the case and the terms of the assignment are set out.

An application was then made on the part of the plaintiff, under ord. 16, r. 2, that Lloyds Bank (Limited) might be substituted or added as plaintiffs in the action.

An order for such substitution was made by the master, and affirmed by Channell, J.

The defendants appealed.

S. T. Evans, K.C., and R. E. Vaughan Williams, for the defendants.—There is no power, under ord. 16, r. 2, to substitute one plaintiff for another, where the original plaintiff has no cause of action: New Westminster Brewery v. Hannah, [1877] W. N. 35; Clowes v. Hilliard, 25 W. R. 224, 4 Ch. D. 413; Walcote v. Lyons, 29 Ch. D. 584, 33 W. R. Dig. 159.

J. E. Bankes, K.C., and L. M. Richards, for Lloyds Bank (Limited), cited Duckett v. Gover, 25 W. R. 455, 6 Ch. D. 82; Ayscough v. Bullar, 37 W. R. 529, 41 Ch. D. 341; and The Duke of Buccleugh, 40 W. R. 455, [1892] P. 201.

COLLINS, M.R.—The right of the plaintiff Hughes to maintain this action depended on the question whether the assignment made by him to Lloyds Bank was an absolute assignment or an assignment by way of charge only. Wright, J., held that it was by way of charge only; this court took the contrary view. That points to this, that a bonâ fide mistake of law had been made, and it lets in the jurisdiction of the court under ord. 16, r. 2.

In my opinion it is clear that the learned judge had jurisdiction to make the order. I will not go through all the authorities, but I think that the last one, The Duke of Buccleugh, is conclusive on the point.

A motion for a rule against justices under section 5 of the Justices' Protection Act, 1848, must be made by counsel.

Motion by the applicant in person for a rule under 11 & 12 Vict. c. 44, s. 5, calling upon certain justices to show cause why they should not hear and determine an application for a summons against Sir Mountstuart Grant Duff and others in respect of certain matters when they were upon the Governing Council of Madras. The Divisional Court had refused to hear the applicant upon the ground that a rule, under 11 & 12 Vict. c. 44, s. 5, could only be moved for by counsel. Reg. v. Byron, 14 Q. B. D. 474, 33 W. R. Dig. 113, decided in 1884, and Ex parte Lewis, 37 W. R. 13, 21 Q. B. D. 191, decided in 1888, were referred to.

Master Coleridge handed to the court a note from his book of four decisions of Divisional Courts, in all of which the court refused to hear an applicant in person for a rule under 11 & 12 Vict. c. 44, s. 5—namely, Mathew and Charles, JJ., in October, 1894; Wills and Wright, JJ., on the 21st of December, 1896; Wright and Bruce, JJ., on the 15th of January, 1897; and Wills and Kennedy, JJ., on the 25th of April, 1898, where Wills, J., said that section 5 of 11 & 12 Vict. c. 44, was merely passed to save the expense of the prerogative writ of mandamus.

COLLINS, M.R.—In this case the Divisional Court refused to hear an application for a rule under section 5 of 11 & 12 Vict. c. 44, calling upon certain justices to show cause why they should not do an act relating to their office, upon the ground that the rule could not be moved for by an applicant in person, but could only be moved for by counsel. The master has referred us to a series of decisions in the Divisional Courts which have not found their way into the reports, but of which he has a note in his book, to the effect that such an application can only be made by counsel. It is therefore a rule of practice of the court not to hear these motions except when made by counsel. We must therefore refuse to hear this application until the applicant appears by counsel.

Committal for non-payment of rates is punitive, and is not "a legal process against the property or person of the debtor" within section 10 (2) of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883. The court has, therefore, no jurisdiction to order the release of the debtor under that sub-section upon proof of the presentation of a bankruptcy petition.

This was an application on behalf of James Edgcombe, a debtor, at present confined in Holloway Prison, for his release.

Edgcombe was the occupier of No. 12, St. James's-square. He was duly assessed to the general rate of the parish of St. James in respect of those premises, and became liable to pay a sum of £174 16s. 4½d. under a general rate made on the 12th of April, 1901. No part of this sum was paid.

On the 19th of September, 1901, a distress warrant was issued directing a levy of this sum by a sale of Edgcombe's goods and chattels. A return of nulla bona was made.

On the 1st of July, 1902, Edgcombe was arrested and lodged in prison under a warrant of commitment issued at the instance of the Corporation of Westminster. The warrant directed that Edgcombe should be imprisoned in Holloway Prison for one month "unless the said sum of £174 16s. 4½d., together with the costs, shall be sooner paid."

On the 2nd of July Edgcombe presented a bankruptcy petition upon which a receiving order was at once made. Thereupon he applied to Mr. Registrar Hope, sitting in bankruptcy, for his release under section 10, sub-section 2, of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883. The registrar refused the application, holding that as the order had been made by a court of competent jurisdiction, he could not interfere; and further, that the order being punitive, the receiving order did not have the effect of releasing the debtor.

Edgcombe appealed against the registrar's decision.

The Debtors Act, 1869, 4, provides as follows: With the exceptions hereinafter mentioned, no person shall, after the commencement of this Act, be arrested or imprisoned for making default in payment of a sum of money.

There shall be excepted from the operation of the above enactments:

1. Default in payment of a penalty, or sum in the nature of a penalty, other than a penalty in respect of any contract.

2. Default in payment of any sum recoverable summarily before a justice or justices of the peace.

3. Default by a trustee or person acting in a fiduciary capacity and ordered to pay by a court of equity any sum in his possession or under his control.

4. Default by an attorney or solicitor in payment of costs when ordered to pay the same in his character of an officer of the court making the order.

5. Default in payment for the benefit of creditors of any portion of a salary or other income in respect of the payment of which any court having jurisdiction in bankruptcy is authorized to make an order.

6. Default in payment of sums in respect of the payment of which orders are in this Act authorized to be made.

Provided, first, that no person shall be imprisoned in any case excepted from the operation of this section for a longer period than one year; and, secondly, that nothing in this section shall alter the effect of any judgment or order of any court for payment of money except as regards the arrest and imprisonment of the person making default in paying such money.

Section 5 of the same Act provides for the committal to prison for a term not exceeding six weeks, or until payment of the sum due, if any person who makes default in payment of any debt or instalment of any debt due from him in pursuance of any order or judgment of a competent court.

By sub-section 2 of section 10 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, "The court may at any time after the presentation of a bankruptcy petition stay any action, execution, or other legal process against the property or person of the debtor, and any court in which proceedings are pending against a debtor may, on proof that a bankruptcy petition has been presented by or against the debtor, either stay the proceedings or allow them to continue on such terms as it may think just."

Haldenstein replied.

The arguments used and cases cited appear sufficiently from the judgments.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—In this case we think that the appeal must fail. I confess that I have arrived at that conclusion with some reluctance, and my reluctance is based upon this, that in the application of the Debtors Act and the effect thereon of the making of a receiving order it does not seem to me that the decisions of the courts and the rules that have been made with reference thereto all follow the same principle. But that is not what we have to consider. We have to determine whether this case is really covered by authority, and whether or not those authorities are right and consistent with the view that has been taken in other respects of the Debtors Act. It is our duty if this case is covered by authority to act upon that authority. [His lordship referred to the facts, and continued:] The section upon which the appellant relies is section 10, sub-section 2, of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883. [His lordship read the section, and continued:] It is said that this process which has resulted in this order for imprisonment for one month is a legal process against the property or person of the debtor for the purpose of enforcing payment of these rates, and therefore that the court in bankruptcy has jurisdiction either to allow or prohibit the continuance of the process. Whether that is so or no depends really upon this, whether the imprisonment which has been ordered is intended as a means of enforcing payment or as a punishment. If it is intended as a punishment there is no jurisdiction under section 10 to order the discharge of the bankrupt from his imprisonment. Now, there can be no doubt that if the law as it was expressed by Mellish, L.J., in Cobham v. Walton, 23 W. R. 865, L. R. 10 Ch. App. 655, is still to be regarded as law we must treat this order for imprisonment merely as process instituted for the purpose of enforcing payment of the debt, because he says, speaking generally of arrest for debt, that it "is intended as a means of enforcing payment, not as a punishment," and he gives as a proof of that this fact, "for if the party pays the debt he is entitled to be discharged." The Distress for Rates Act, 1849, s. 2 of which gives the power of committal to prison for non-payment of rates, recites that by the Poor Relief Act, 1601, a power of imprisonment was given, not for a limited time, but a power to commit the party to gaol "there to remain without bail or mainprize until payment"; and goes on to authorize a person in default of payment "to be imprisoned in the common gaol or house of correction for any time not exceeding three calendar months unless the sum or sums therein mentioned shall be sooner paid." If we could apply the observations of Mellish, L.J., and the reason which he gives for treating the arrest as a mere means of enforcing payment, it would follow in this case we should have to treat the order as a mere means of enforcing payment, for undoubtedly on the terms of the section and on the face of the warrant the debtor is entitled to his discharge on payment of the debt. But if we look at the authorities it seems that we must not regard that observation of Mellish, L.J., as being still law. The general effect of the Debtors Act, 1869, is this. Section 4 says: "With the exceptions hereinafter mentioned no person shall after the commencement of this Act be arrested or imprisoned for making default in the payment of a sum of money." There is a general abolition of imprisonment for debt subject only to the exceptions which follow, which are, (1) Default in payment of a penalty, (2) default in payment of any sum recoverable summarily before a justice or justices of the peace." That is this case. I need not read them all, but there is a list of exceptions as to which the liability to imprisonment is continued notwithstanding the general abolition of imprisonment for debt. It is right to observe in passing that there is another saving on this general abolition of imprisonment; that is, under the 5th section, which provides that "subject to the provisions hereinafter mentioned and to the prescribed rules, any court may commit to prison for a term not exceeding six weeks or until payment of the sum due any persons who makes default in payment of any debt or instalment of any debt due from him in pursuance of any order or judgment of that or any other competent court"; and amongst the conditions under which that order may be made one finds in sub-section 2, "that such jurisdiction shall only be exercised when it is proved to the satisfaction of the court that the person making default either has or has had since the date of the order or judgment the means to pay the sum in respect of which he has made default and has refused or neglected or refuses or neglects to pay the same." Lord Hatherley in Middleton v. Chichester, 19 W. R. 369, L. R. 6 Ch. App. 152, considers the exceptions in section 4 under which the liability to imprisonment still continues, and says this: "Now, the first exception is the case of a penalty, and that makes the distinction I have pointed out extremely clear, because if it is merely a penalty in respect of a contract that is not to deprive the person who has incurred it of the benefit of the section; but if it is any other sort of penalty, by which is meant a penalty for non-observance of a positive law, then he is to be exempted from the benefit of the section. The second exception is default in payment of any sum recoverable summarily before a justice or justices of the peace. That again would be something in the nature of a penalty and not in the nature of a simple debt." He goes on to deal with the other exceptions. I need not read what he says at length—but he mentions the case of default by a trustee and misconduct by a solicitor, and he says, "Therefore in every case there is something of the character of delinquency pointed out, and one cannot see that it makes a shadow of difference with reference to the question of delinquency whether a person has the money in his possession at the time the order is made or had parted with it some short time before the making of the order." The view of Lord Hatherley undoubtedly was that each one of the exceptions in section 4 retained imprisonment because the Legislature treated each of the cases as one in which there was a delinquency, and that the imprisonment was therefore a punishment, and differed from a mere process for the recovery of a debt. Later on, in 1893, this question had to be considered again in the Court of Appeal in In re Smith, Hands v. Andrews, 41 W. R. 289, [1893] 2 Ch. 1, at p. 17, where Lindley, L.J. says "Although Cobham v. Walton was decided in 1875 and Middleton v. Chichester was decided in 1871, and the Lords Justices who decided Cobham v. Walton were members of the court which decided Middleton v. Chichester, the view then taken and expressed with reference to the punitive character of section 4 of the Debtors Act, 1869, seems to have been overlooked by them." It will be observed that he is not there speaking of any particular sub-section, but generally of section 4. He continues: "James, L.J., does not allude to it. Mellish, L.J., said, 'Now, arrest for debt is intended as a means of enforcing payment, not as a punishment, for if the party pays the debt he is entitled to be discharged.' This observation was true of ordinary debts in In re M'Williams, 1 Sch. & Lef. 169, Lees v. Newton, 14 W. R. 938, L. R. 1 C. P. 658, but not of obligations to pay under orders made under section 4, sub-section 3, of the Debtors Act, 1869. The punitive character of section 4 of the Debtors Act, 1869, which was pointed out in Middleton v. Chichester has been since so often recognized that it cannot now be questioned." He cites some cases and goes on to say: "In all these cases, however, the fact that a commitment under that section is not to be regarded simply as a form of civil process, but as punitive, is distinctly recognised. Having regard to the Debtors Act, 1878, and to the decisions to which we have referred, it would be clearly wrong now to apply Mellish, L.J.'s, observation in Cobham v. Walton above quoted to obligations to pay money in obedience to orders made under the Debtors Act, 1869, s. 4, sub-section 3."

It is quite true that when he goes on to say what they should do with the case then before the court, he speaks only of section 4, sub-section 3, that being the one which deals with trustees who have had trust funds in their possession, but I have read the whole passage in order that it may be seen clearly that although his language at last only applies to sub-section 3, the principle in terms applies to the whole of the exceptions in section 4, and not only to sub-section 3. In other words, Lindley, L.J., did what Lord Hatherley had so carefully and plainly done in Middleton v. Chichester, where he went through, one by one, every one of the exceptions to section 4, and pointed out that they were all punitive and not to be treated as process for enforcing payment of the debt.

In these circumstances I think we have no choice but to treat this as a punitive order, and one from the stringency of which James Edgcombe cannot obtain relief under section 10 of the Bankruptcy Act. I think this is unsatisfactory, because it is plain that the practical non-application of relief under the Bankruptcy Act to these cases as to which imprisonment has been continued by the Debtors Act has not been consistently followed. It is obvious that section 5 is just as much an exception from the general abolition of imprisonment for debt as is section 4. The exception is put in a different section because it is a section which deals with the power of the court to commit a debtor to prison for non-payment of a judgment debt; and when one looks at the conditions under which such an order is allowed to be made, it is perfectly plain that it can only be made when there is a contumacious debtor who has the means or has had the means to pay the debt, and his conduct is in the nature of contempt. His imprisonment is for a fixed time not exceeding six weeks, and is a punishment for the contempt, and the suffering of that imprisonment in no way discharges the debt, and one would have thought that if the principles I have been dealing with had been applied consistently, the result would have been that no relief could be given under sections 9 and 10 of the Bankruptcy Act after a receiving order had been made. That is not the case. So far from that, under the County Court Rules, 1889, which have been made applicable to all courts with jurisdiction in respect of judgment debtor summonses by ord. 25, r. 29, "Where a judgment debtor shall upon the return day of a judgment summons satisfy the judge that a receiving order has been made for the protection of his estate, or that he has been adjudicated bankrupt, and that the debt was provable in the bankruptcy . . . no order of commitment shall be made except in accordance with the provisions of the last-mentioned section" (section 122 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883). Under these circumstances it does seem to me a little unfortunate that the same principle has not been acted on with regard to exceptions under section 5 that has been acted on with regard to exceptions under section 4, although one would have said that if any of these exceptions were in respect of the conduct of the debtor being such as merited punishment they would have been those under section 5. However, we have not to deal with that here.

The result is that, in respect of this particular debt, a debt for rates, the getting of a receiving order does not entitle the debtor to ask for relief under these sections of the Bankruptcy Act, notwithstanding the fact that at any time during the imprisonment he could get rid of the imprisonment by payment of the debt. Notwithstanding that, it seems to me that unless we disregard Middleton v. Chichester and In re Smith, Hands v. Andrews we are bound to say with regard to the exceptions in each one of the subsections of section 4 that the orders were punitive orders. The appeal must be dismissed.

ROMER, L.J.—I also think that this appeal fails. It is true that a committal under an order of a magistrate, if and when made under the statute 12 & 13 Vict. c. 14, terminates on payment by the debtor, but the committal nevertheless is of a punitive character and not merely a legal process to compel payment. That is made clear by the express provision of the Act; for by the Act a discretion is given to the magistrate as to whether he will or will not commit, and, if he does commit, a discretion as to the period for which he will commit not exceeding three months. To my mind, in making an order under the Act the magistrate is bound to exercise his discretion, and in so doing he must have regard to the existing circumstances, and must consider what in these circumstances, if the money is not paid, the duration of the imprisonment ought to be. That shows that it is something in the nature of a punishment apart from legal process to procure payment. If the order is punitive the court of bankruptcy has no power to interfere. The same view is arrived at by a consideration of section 4 of the Debtors Act, 1869. The exceptions there mentioned from the general rule that there shall be no imprisonment for debt form a class of cases standing on the same footing; and these were excepted because imprisonment under them all, was meant to be a punishment. That was the view expressed by Lord Hatherley in Middleton v. Chichester, and by Lindley, L.J., in In re Smith, Hands v. Andrews, and also by Jessel, M.R., in Marris v. Ingram, 28 W. R. 434, 13 Ch. D. 338.

STIRLING, L.J.—I am of the same opinion, and for the same reasons; but I should like to add this: This case is one of rates, and depends on particular statutes. If it were an isolated case one might have supposed that it had escaped the notice of the persons who framed the Debtors Act, 1869, but in truth there must be a large class of orders of the same kind made by magistrates; for instance, orders for imprisonment for non-payment of costs under section 18 of the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1848 (11 & 12 Vict. c. 43); 23 & 24 Vict. c. 32, rioting in church; 62 & 63 Vict. c. 32, enforcing attendance at school. I think that this is not an isolated case, and that the appeal must fail.

The Crown is entitled to the personal property in England left by an illegitimate unmarried foreign intestate, who was domiciled and died abroad, for the Crown takes such property, not by right of succession, but as being bona vacantia in England, and the lex domicilii does not therefore apply.

Petition.

By his will William Barnett, of Old Bracknell, in the county of Berks, and of the city of Vienna, gave the residue of his estate in England, subject to two annuities, to Aloysius, otherwise Louis Heller, who was a natural son of the testator.

On the 22nd of November, 1837, the testator died.

Aloysius or Louis Heller died on the 9th of March, 1883, a bachelor and intestate.

The two annuitants died in 1880 and 1885 respectively.

On the 27th of April, 1900, letters of administration of the personal estate of Aloysius or Louis Heller were granted to the solicitor of the Treasury, who now presented this petition praying that after payment of sums due to the representatives of the deceased annuitants, and subject to due provision being made as to the costs of the respondents the money might be transferred to the account of the Treasury solicitor and the Assistant Paymaster-General.

The official solicitor of the court, the legal personal representative of the testator, and the Finance Minister of the Imperial Royal Austro-Hungarian Government were respondents.

Succession in the German hereditary provinces of the Austrian monarchy is regulated by the General Civil Code. So far as concerns the point in dispute the Code was proved to be as follows:

Art. 380.—Immovable things are subject to the laws of the district in which they are situated. All other things, on the contrary, are the same as the person of their proprietor under the same legislation.

Art. 754.—Illegitimate children have in regard to the mother, as far as the legal succession in the free inheritable property is concerned, equal rights with the legitimate children. No legal right of inheritance belongs to the illegitimate children in regard to the succession of the father and the paternal relations; and further, in regard to the succession of the parent's grandfather and grandmother and other relations of the mother.

Art. 756.—The right of succession to the property of a child which has remained illegitimate belongs only to the mother; the father, and all the grandfathers and grandmothers and other relations of the child, are excluded from it.

Art. 559.—If neither a relation of the deceased belonging to one of the six lines mentioned (these dealt with succession to the legitimate children), nor another line appointed by Arts. 752 to 756 (relating to certain cases of legitimation and adoption) exists, the whole inheritance falls to the spouse.

Art. 760.—If the spouse is no longer alive, the succession is confiscated as heirless property either by the fiscus or by those persons who according to the political ordinances are justified in confiscating heir less estates.

In Vienna there were no such political ordinance which justifies any person other than the fiscus in confiscating such heirless estates. The fiscus is the Imperial Royal Treasury Office of the Austrian Empire, the official head of which is the Imperial Royal Finance Minister.

Sir R. B. Finlay, A.G., Sir E. H. Carson, S.G., and R. J. Parker, for the petitioner.—This fund is bona vacantia, and the Crown is entitled to it. According to the Austrian code the fiscus is entitled not by way of succession, but by the right to confiscate property to which there is no heir. The property is in this country, and the Crown is entitled to it as bona vacantia: Dyke v. Walford, 5 Moo. P. C. 434. This is a rule of general application and applies to corporations as well as to natural persons: In re Higginson and Dean, Ex parte Attorney-General, 47 W. R. 285, [1899] 1 Q. B. 325. As it is not a case of succession, but of confiscation, the law of the domicil does not govern this case. The only two cases which bear on this point—Aspinwall v. Queen's Proctor, 2 Curt. 241, and In the Goods of Beggia, 1 Add. 340—did not decide it.

They also referred to Lausant Le Droit Civil International (1st ed.), vol. 6, pp. 435, 446; Westlake's Private International Law (3rd ed.), p. 168; Foelix Traité du Droit International Privé, s. 62.

Warrington, K.C., and A. Adams, for the Austrian Finance Minister.—In the case of a deceased foreigner the law of the domicil prevails, and the court will give it to whomsoever it is given by that law. Here the State succeeds to the property in default of heirs, the fact that the word used is "confiscate" does not make any difference—it is enough that in applying the Austrian law the court finds a person entitled to the property. The rule is mobilia sequuntur personam, and there is no reason for making an exception here. No English authority or text-book has been cited in which such an exception is referred to. Westlake (3rd ed.), pp. 93-95, 130, makes no mention of it, nor does Dicey's Conflict of Laws, pp. 677 and 179. The law of the domicil here disposes of this property in every event; it cannot, therefore, be bona vacantia.

Methold, for the official receiver.

Herbert Robertson, for the personal representative of the testator.

KEKEWICH, J.—We have had a very interesting discussion, and reference has been made to many authorities, including some decided cases, and I think rather more text-writers. None of those are out of place as tending to throw considerable light on the discussion, which I agree has been of an interesting character; but, after all, it seems to me we are brought back to questions of English law, which must be decided in the absence of direct authority according to principle, and that principle which governs English law on this particular subject. Reference has been made to many writers, both English and foreign writers, on what is termed private international law. What those writers have said is apposite, because in dealing with a question of this kind one is thrown back on maxims and principles, and the exposition of them by text-writers is important and is always accepted as a guide, but it is admitted on all hands that they fail to deal in an authoritative manner with the particular question which I am called upon to decide. There is no doubt the dicta go to this, that in a case where a man dies heirless (I naturally use the expression in the affidavit for the respondents) his personal property must go in the manner indicated by the law of the deceased's domicil. There are dicta, and sometimes dicta that are probably clear on that point, but those dicta do not profess to lay down general propositions. In each case that has been cited to me, I think it true to say it is given with a modification and a possibility of an application of a different rule elsewhere. Now, the respondent's argument is that this case is governed by the old maxim which is embodied in our English law, and which is to be found repeated in one form and another by all the text writers, mobilia sequuntur personam, and the respondents' point is that that maxim is applicable to the case of a man dying heirless and leaving personalty, or strictly speaking movable property, outside his domicil. That is the position. Now mobilia sequuntur personam is translated over and over again by text writers, as well by foreign as English, and reduced to definitions and rules, and they are all more or less in the same form and to the same extent. I do not know that anyone can find anything better than the rule from Mr. Dicey's book, which is cited on behalf of the respondents, rule 179, on p. 677. You cannot read that rule so as to understand it without reading the preceding rule, No. 178, which deals with the payment of debts with which we are now concerned, it being admitted on all hands that the debts of the intestate would have to be paid according to the law of the country in which the property was found. The debts being out of the way, you have to deal with what Mr. Dicey calls the distributable residue, and there he lays down his rule, "The distribution of the distributable residue of the movables of the deceased is (in general) governed by the law of the deceased's domicil (lex domicilii) at the time of his death." On the next page he describes what he means by "the law of the deceased's domicil." I need not read the passage because I think it may be taken we all mean the same thing by that term. That seems to me to exactly illustrate the meaning and extent of the rule. It is the distribution of the distributable residue. When you come to distribute the deceased's property then you must follow the law of the deceased's domicil, whether it is according to some statute—whether it is according to what the English call common law, whether it is among relations because they claim in that character, or among persons who are entitled under the will—in whatever aspect you look at it the distribution must follow the law of the domicil; but that is distributing it exactly as is meant, or rather part of what is meant by mobilia sequuntur personam. Now we have to deal with a case here where there is no distribution at all—where there is really no persona to follow. Mr. Warrington argues that the Crown or any other person, his own client for instance, coming in and obtaining administration to the deceased's estate is for all intents and purposes the deceased's personal representative. He says that he is so, and that we call him "the legal personal representative" of the deceased. But that is only the language of our law. He does not represent him at all, except that by our law he is put in his place to defend actions brought by creditors, or it may be of persons who are claiming the estate against him. In no other sense does he claim any estate. He does not claim through the persona, through the deceased. He claims what in some old authorities is called the glanscaduca—the acorn which has fallen from the tree, and not the acorn on the tree or connected with the tree. It is the acorn which has fallen on to the ground from the tree. There is no possibility of getting at this property through the deceased. It is because there is nobody who can claim through the deceased, no one who can be entitled, that the Crown steps in and takes the property. In other words, the Crown takes it because it is, as described in the cases, bona vacantia—it is property which no one claims. It is property at large. There is no succession. The Crown does not claim it by succession at all. It claims it because there is no succession. All the learning on this subject of the bona vacantia is to be found in the case of Dyke v. Walford which was cited in argument, and to which I need not refer. It was there, no doubt, a contest of a peculiar character, and the judgment delivered by Lord Kingsdown goes into the duties and the powers of the ordinary, and goes to get rid of any claim on the part of the church, but the principle is that the Crown comes and claims it, as was put in the case cited by the Attorney-General as jura regalia, the right to take that which belonged to no one; and if that is really the sound view I cannot see how, according to English law, there can be a right in anyone else to say that the maxim Mobilia sequuntur personam applies, and there should be an administration and distribution and settlement of rights according to the domicil of the deceased person, who in effect by dying lost the claim not only for himself, but those left behind, to his domicil. If that is the sound view it seems to me that concludes the question. I am not dealing here with any case in which another claimant may be desirous to enforce a different rule. It may be—I do not say it will be, but it may be—that hereafter, if a case arises where there is a conflict between the two countries respecting the law on the subject, a more difficult question may have to be decided, and decided on the ground of international comity; but with that I have not to deal at all, because it seems to me perfectly clear on the statement of law in this learned affidavit which states the code, that as between Austria and England there is no real difference on this subject. I have not forgotten the previous paragraphs, which have been referred to in argument, but it is really article 760 which is directly applicable. The words with which it commences, "If the spouse is no longer alive," must be read in connection with the immediate preceding clause, which gives the whole inheritance to the spouse with certain conditions there mentioned. Reading article 760 alone, those words, "If the spouse is no longer alive," are equivalent to this, that if there be no person to claim as heir, then the succession is confiscated as heirless property. The great difficulty in the case, to my mind, is in dealing with the poverty of language—the poverty, at any rate, of the English language. The word "confiscated" is a word capable of being used in many senses. In the ordinary sense it is where the Crown intervenes not to take up as belonging to it a thing because it is vacant, but to take up by way of penalty in exercise of sovereign rights, different from those which are asserted in a case like this, and which must be the meaning, I think, of "confiscated" here. Here it does not mean "confiscated" in the sense of taking by way of penalty. It is taken to the Crown—assumed by the Crown—as its own property. What the code says, it is confiscated as heirless property—that is, as property which we call in England bona vacantia. That is the same thing—property to which there is no heir because neither country admits the right of the passing traveller, and therefore the property must fall to the Crown as a matter of right in the exercise of its sovereign power. The rest of it is really of no importance for this purpose. It only says "Either by the fiscus or those persons who according to the political ordinances are justified in confiscating heirless estates"—that is to say, by the person appointed for the purpose, whether it be the Minister of Finance in one country or the Solicitor to the Treasury in another is immaterial—it is as heirless property. That seems to me to be precisely on our lines—that when there is no heir, then some paramount authority steps in and claims it—not as against anyone else, because there is nobody to claim it at all. But then it is said "You must remember the law is different as regards succession in Austria from what it is here, that there is a limit to the persons to take, and that makes a difference." I notice that argument because it was urged, but I confess I fail to see the force of it. What matters it, looking at it from an Austrian point of view, to them, that according to English law those related by half blood are allowed to come in? What would it matter if the relation of half blood was excluded? It must come back to this: under what circumstances does the succession stop, or rather perhaps I should say under what circumstances does no succession arise; under what circumstances is the paramount authority entitled to come in and say, I take because there is nobody else to take? That seems to me to be the whole question, and it matters not in the least whether any description of person is allowed to come in or not, or whether there is a limit or no limit to those entitled to claim. It seems to me to be all upon the same lines, and that really when once you have got at the principle which I have endeavoured to express, if not all, by far the large majority of the passages which have been quoted of the dicta, can all be construed by reference to that principle, having regard to the unfortunate poverty of language which makes you speak of "succession" when there is no succession, simply because there is no other expression which fits in so well with ordinary parlance. An excellent illustration was given of that by the Attorney-General in opening the case, and which is to be found in several of the books (I think in Dyke v. Walford more than once), which speaks of the Crown as ultimus hæres. It is not only not English, but it is perfectly inaccurate—as inaccurate really as an expression could well be, and yet, like many other inaccurate expressions, it is thoroughly well understood and is very convenient. Only, when you come to use convenient expressions which are inaccurate technically, and deduce therefrom principles and thereon found a rule, you are likely to be led into error, and in fact almost sure to be led into error. I think the principle is that which I have stated, and that it must govern this case. There must be a declaration in favour of the Crown's rights. The costs of the Crown, the official solicitor, and the trustee must come out of the fund in court, but the costs of the Austrian Government, as an adverse claimant, cannot be allowed.

ANDERSON v. BERKLEY. (a.)

Will—Construction—Bequest—Compound designation—Inaccurate description—Validity.

Where the description of a legatee is made up of more than one part, and one part is true but the other false, if the part which is true describes the subject or object of the gift with sufficient certainty, the untrue part will be rejected, and will not vitiate the gift. Thus the description of a legatee as "L., the wife of my son F.," is sufficient to pass the gift to L., although she was not in fact the lawful wife of F., although the testator believed that she was.

By his will dated the 22nd of November, 1892, the testator bequeated to his son Francis the sum of £1,000 absolutely, and he bequeathed to his trustees the sum of £5,000 upon trust to invest the same and pay the income to arise therefrom "to my said son Francis during his life and from and after his death to pay such income to his wife Letitia during her life if she should survive him, and after the death of the survivor of my said son Francis and Letitia his wife" upon trust for all the children of his said son Francis as therein mentioned, and in default of children upon trust for such of the testator's other children as should then be living. At the date of the will and for some years previously the testator's son Francis had resided in New Zealand. In the year 1888 he had written home to the testator to the effect that he had married and that the name of his wife was "Letitia Lilian." This lady was then living with him and continued to live with him till his death as his wife. They were reputed to be and were treated as lawfully married. The testator never saw or had any direct communication with the lady. The testator's son Francis died in 1899. In September, 1899, the testator's trustees discovered that the testator's son Francis and Letitia had never been lawfully married. This action was therefore commenced to settle who was entitled to the income of this sum of £5,000 during the life of Letitia.

Hughes, K.C., and A. H. Jessel, for the plaintiff.—This is only an error of description; the person to whom the bequest is made is clearly indicated, and the gift is therefore good, as a misdescription will not defeat the legacy: Giles v. Giles, 1 Keen 685; In re Petts, 8 W. R. 157, 27 Beav. 576; Turner v. Brittain, 3 N. R. 21. In Wilkinson v. Joughin, L. R. 2 Eq. 319, 14 W. R. Ch. Dig. 146, the one gift was held void through the fraud of the devisee in having concealed the fact that she had a husband living at the time she went through the form of marriage with the testator, yet a gift to her daughter under the description of the testator's step-daughter was held to be good. No question of fraud can arise here, as if there was any at all it was the fraud of the testator's son, not of the legatee, and if it were proved that any part of the will was obtained by fraud it would then be a question for the Probate Division: Allen v. M'Pherson, 1 H. L. Cas. 191; Meluish v. Milton, 24 W. R. 892, 3 Ch. D. 27. In re Boddington, 32 W. R. 448, 25 Ch. D. 685, is distinguishable, as there the gift was made during widowhood.

W. F. Hamilton, K.C., for persons entitled under the gift over.—There is no wife of the testator's son Francis; the gift therefore fails, and the court is entitled to look at the probable motive of the testator in giving the legacy. This legatee was not known personally to the testator, and there is no evidence to justify the court in arriving at the conclusion that no other person but this lady was in the mind of the testator when he framed this gift: In re Davenport's Trusts, 1 W. R. 103, 1 Sm. & Giff. 126; Kennell v. Abbott, 4 Ves. 802.

Whinney, for the trustees of the will.

Jessel, in reply.—The testator knew the lady sufficiently for the purpose of identification.

April 19.—JOYCE, J.—George Berkley, the testator, who died in December, 1893, by his will, dated the 22nd of November, 1892, bequeathed to his son Francis the sum of £1,000 absolutely, and he bequeathed to his trustees the sum of £5,000 upon trust to invest the same and to pay the income to arise therefrom to his said son Francis during his life, and from and after his death to pay such income to his wife Letitia during her life if she should survive him, and after the death of the survivor of his said son Francis and Letitia his wife upon trust for all the children of his said son Francis as therein mentioned. The testator's son Francis was at the date of the will in New Zealand. In or about November, 1888, he wrote from Dunedin to some members of his family in this country, including the testator, stating that he had married Letitia Lilian Cumberland; and there was no doubt that she was then living with the testator's son Francis and continued to live with him until his death as his wife. They were reputed to be, and were treated as, lawfully married. It would appear, however, that the testator never saw or had any direct communication with the lady, but his will contains the disposition I have read. It now turns out that the testator's son Francis and Letitia Cumberland were never lawfully married, though they represented themselves to be so. In registering the birth of a daughter, born of their union in the year 1894, the date and place of their marriage was stated to be "1880, January 19, London, England." If entitled to conjecture upon the subject, it is possible and probable that what induced the testator to confer any benefit by his will upon this lady was the belief that she was the wife of his son. It was not, however, a legacy to anyone under the simple description of "the wife of my son Francis" without any reference to a particular individual. If it had been, any person claiming must, I suppose, have shown that she really sustained that character. The bequest was to "my son's wife Letitia" if she should survive him—that is, to a legatee named with an additional description which was not satisfied, inasmuch as there was not any lawful wife of the testator's son Francis in the strict legal sense of the term, though perhaps in a secondary sense Letitia Berkley or Cumberland might be called his wife. Now this is not a case of a competition between rival claimants to a gift where one part only of the description fits one claimant and the other part of the description only fits the other, as in Garland v. Beverly, 26 W. R. 718, 9 Ch. D. 213, where the various considerations applicable to such a case will be found. The simple question here is whether in the circumstances Letitia Berkley can take under the gift, or whether it fails and sinks into residue. There is no question of any fraud by the legatee in the obtaining of the bequest. It is not like the cases of Kennell v. Abbott, 4 Ves. 802, or Wilkinson v. Joughin, where a gift to a supposed husband or wife of a testatrix or testator not being actually such was held to fail by reason of a fraud practised on the testatrix or testator by the legatee: Jarman on Wills, p. 895n. The question is whether, according to the true construction of the will, the gift is in effect conditional upon Letitia's being the lawful wife of the testator's son Francis. In In re Boddington Lord

(a.) Reported by C. W. MEAD, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Selborne, L.C., held that upon the true construction of the will in that case the bequest of an annuity to the testator's wife, Emily Caroline Boddington, was expressly conditional upon her being and remaining his lawful widow. There are not any such words of condition here. The legacy is intended for some person of whom the name, with a description, is given for the purpose of ascertaining and identifying the individual. We have a compound designation consisting of the name Letitia—there is no doubt to whom that refers—and the description, "wife of my son Francis." It is a rule, however, that where the description is made up of more than one part, and one part was true but the other false, then if the part which is true describes the subject or object of the gift with sufficient certainty, the untrue part will be rejected and will not vitiate the gift: Jarman on Wills, p. 742, cited and approved by Lord Lindley in Cowen v. Truefitt (Limited), 47 W. R. 661, [1899] 2 Ch. 309. And as Lord Cottenham says in Rishton v. Cobb, 5 My. & Cr. 145, at p. 151, the rule that where the identity of the legatee is certain, the gift will not be avoided by an inaccuracy in the description, would be destroyed if the court permitted itself to speculate without proof, upon what might have been the object of the testator in giving the legacy. It was impossible to say what the testator in the present case would have done if he had positively known the precise facts in reference to the relation between his son and this lady. I hold, therefore, that the gift to "my son Francis' wife Letitia if she shall survive him" does not fail, and my decision is in accordance with that of Lord Romilly in Turner v. Brittain, which is, I think, the nearest case to the present that was to be found in the books.

HUDSON v. GRIBBLE. (a.)

Inland Revenue—Income tax—Deductions—Sum payable or chargeable by virtue of any Act of Parliament—Income Tax Act, 1842 (5 & 6 Vict. c. 35), s. 146, rr. 1 and 9—Manchester Corporation Act, 1891, s. 5.

The Manchester Corporation Act, 1891, empowered the corporation to establish a fund for encouraging thrift amongst its officers and servants, and for providing a fund for them or their representatives on their retirement or death. The scheme passed by the corporation provided that persons who were in their employ previous to the passing of the Act should, on their applying in writing, be admitted to the benefits of the fund, and having been admitted they could not, while in the service of the corporation, withdraw from the fund.

Held, that a servant of the corporation who had been so admitted on his own application could not deduct the amount of his payments to the fund from the amount payable by him for income tax on the ground that it was a deduction pursuant to section 146, r. 1, of the Income Tax Act, 1842, by which duty is payable on salaries after deducting the amount of duties or other sums payable or chargeable on the same by virtue of any Act of Parliament.

Beaumont v. Bowers, 48 W. R. 557, [1900] 2 Q. B. 204, distinguished.

This was an appeal by the deputy town clerk in the employ of Manchester Corporation disallowing a deduction which he claimed to make in respect of contributions made by him to the Manchester Corporation Thrift Fund. The special case set out the following facts:

By section 5 of the Manchester Corporation Act, 1891, the corporation were empowered to set up a fund for the encouragement of thrift among the officers and servants of the corporation, and with a view to providing a sum of money which in the event of the retirement or death of any person in the service of the corporation should be available for himself or his representatives.

The corporation were empowered to approve by resolution what classes of persons should be entitled to contribute to and participate in the benefits of the fund, and to what extent such contribution should be payable by persons entering or who should have entered the service of the corporation after the service of the Act, and also upon what terms and conditions persons in the service of the corporation at the time of the passing of the Act should on their application be admitted to the benefit of the Thrift Fund.

On the 3rd of August, 1892, the corporation of the city approved and adopted a scheme for the establishment of the thrift fund.

The scheme contained (inter alia) the following provisions:

Article I.—Every person who is now employed by the corporation with a salary or wages of less than 30s. per week, but who shall or may hereafter be so employed with a salary or wages at a rate of not less than 30s. per week, and who has been taken into such service since the 5th of August, 1891, or may hereafter be taken into such service as from or after the date on which he shall commence to be employed with a salary or wages at a rate of not less than 30s. per week . . . shall contribute and pay to the Thrift Fund 3·15 per cent. upon his actual salary or wages for the time being which contributions and payments may be deducted.

Each of the following persons as from the dates or times specified—namely:—

Every person who is or shall be employed by the corporation with a salary or wages of not less than 30s. per week, and who has been taken into the service of the corporation since the 5th of August, 1891, the date of the passing of the Act, and who may be taken into such service before the 1st of October, 1892, as from and after the 30th of September, 1892.

Or, every person who shall be employed by the corporation with a salary or wage of not less than 30s. per week, and who may be taken into such service on or after the 1st of October, 1892, as and from the date of his being taken into such service pro rata by the corporation from time to time as and when the salary or wages shall become payable, and no person shall cease to so contribute to the Thrift Fund while in the service of the corporation.

II.—Each of the following persons, namely:—

(a) Any person who on the 5th of August, 1891, was in the service of the corporation, whatever his remuneration.

(b) Any person employed by the corporation with a salary or wages at the rate of less than 30s. per week who has been taken into such service since the 5th of August, 1891, or shall hereafter be taken into such service, may by an application in writing under his hand be admitted to the fund and become and continue a contributor in the summons and upon the same terms and conditions as if he were one of the persons to whom Article I. of the scheme applies, provided that no person who shall have been so admitted and shall so become a contributor shall cease to contribute to the Thrift Fund while in the service of the corporation.

The appellant, Thomas Hudson, was in the service of the corporation prior to the 5th of August, 1891, and on the 31st of August applied in writing to be admitted to the benefit of the fund, pursuant to Article 2 of the scheme, and he thereupon became, and still continues to be, a contributor to the fund, and under the provisions of the scheme cannot cease to contribute to the fund while in the service of the corporation. He claimed to be allowed to deduct the amount of his contribution to the fund by reason of section 146 of the Income Tax Act, 1842 (5 & 6 Vict. c. 35), rules for charging the duties under schedule.

By rule I. it is provided that the duties shall be annually charged on the persons exercising the office or employments mentioned in the schedule.

For all salaries, fees, wages, perquisites, or profits accruing by reason of such offices or employments, "after deducting the amount of duties or other sums payable or chargeable on the same by virtue of any Act of Parliament when the same have been really and bonâ fide paid and borne by the party to be charged."

By the 9th rule it is provided that in estimating the duty payable for any such office or employment of profit all official deductions and payments made upon the receipt of the profits and salaries thereof shall be allowed to be deducted, provided that a due account thereof be rendered to the Commissioners and proved to their satisfaction.

The appellant contended that under these rules he was entitled to deduct the amount of his contribution to the Thrift Fund, and that he was only chargeable on the amount of his salary after making such deduction.

The Commissioners disallowed the deduction, but stated this case.

Asquith, K.C. (Ryde with him), for the appellant.—The case is indistinguishable from Beaumont v. Bowers, 48 W. R. 557, [1900] 2 Q. B. 204. In that case the appellant was bound by the scheme if he did not exercise his option. Here the appellant did exercise his option under the Act, but that can make no difference.

They also cited Herbert v. McQuade, [1901] 2 K. B. 761, 49 W. R. Dig. 78.

Sir E. Carson, S.G. (S. A. T. Rowlatt with him), for the Crown.—Beaumont v. Bowers does not apply. There the deduction was made by virtue of the appellant's contract with the corporation, and the fact that the appellant cannot now withdraw from the scheme is not the result of the Act of Parliament, but of the appellant's acceptance of the provisions of the scheme.

Asquith, K.C., replied.

PHILLIMORE, J.—In this case the question is whether the appellant can claim to deduct the sum which he pays to the corporation of Manchester under a Thrift Fund scheme on the ground that what he pays to the corporation is a deduction from "the salary" of an amount of duty or other sum payable or chargeable on the same by virtue of any Act of Parliament.

The corporation of Manchester are enabled by Act of Parliament to make this deduction from salary if the appellant chooses to let them do it, and they are enabled by Act of Parliament to supplement the fund by contributions; they are to invest the fund so created for the benefit of the appellant and his fellows. They are enabled by Act of Parliament to compel their future servants to come in on these terms, and it has been admitted by the Crown that, as regards the future servants who are under such compulsion by virtue of the Act of Parliament and the scheme, they may claim to deduct the sum they pay by virtue of it in assessing the amount of their income tax. With regard, however, to the servants who were in the service of the corporation of Manchester before and on the 5th of August, 1891, there is no compulsion on any such servant to accept the terms of the scheme; he does not pay the deduction or allow the corporation to make the deduction by virtue of an Act of Parliament. The only way the Act of Parliament comes in is to enable the corporation to contract—and, it may be said, to compel the corporation—to receive applications from the appellant and persons in his position if they choose to make them, but again only subject to such terms and conditions as the corporation may think fit to impose. No doubt it is contemplated by the Act of Parliament that the corporation shall hold out the same terms to everybody by the scheme; and, no doubt, so long as the scheme remains they must accept any application upon the terms set out in the scheme; but they are entitled to vary the scheme, and the utmost that can be said is that the corporation are enabled, and in certain circumstances compelled, to deal with the appellant if he chooses to apply to them to be admitted to the benefits of the Thrift Fund; but there is no compulsion upon him by the existing scheme, which they may modify as long as they do not modify it to his disadvantage. No doubt after his application and his admission by the corporation to the benefits of the Thrift Fund he is bound by the scheme. So long as he continues the servant of the corporation he cannot cease to contribute his due proportion to the fund; but that is not by virtue of any Act of Parliament. There is no such provision in the Act of Parliament. I cannot find that this sum is chargeable or payable upon the appellant's salary "by virtue of any Act of Parliament." I think that the case differs very widely from Beaumont v. Bowers, where the actual compulsion was on the applicant. He was certainly compelled in that case to submit to the deduction, unless he chose on a day then past to express positively once and for all his refusal to be bound by the Act. I do not see that the power of option was much discussed or dwelt upon by the court in that case; but even supposing it was, it is a quite different power to the power in this case. The deduction is not really charged upon him by any Act of Parliament at all.

It might almost as well be said than an Act of Parliament has said that every contract in writing shall be enforced and charged upon any man who enters into such a contract. This deduction is chargeable here upon him by virtue of his application, which the corporation are enabled, and to some extent compelled, by Act of Parliament, to accept.

I think that there must be judgment for the Crown with costs.

Appeal dismissed.

Adulteration—Food—Sale of article not of nature, substance, and quality of article demanded—Milk as taken from cow deficient in fat—Sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 63), s. 6.

A purchaser demanded to be supplied with new milk, and was given an article which came direct from the cow and which had not been tampered with or adulterated in any way, but which, on analysis, was found to be deficient in milk fat. This deficiency was caused by the abnormal method employed in milking the cows—viz., an interval of sixteen hours between the evening milking and the morning milking, at which the milk in question was drawn.

Held, by Lord Alverstone, L.C.J., and Channell, J. (Darling, J., dissenting), that there was sufficient evidence on which the justices might find that the seller had committed the offence under section 6 of the Sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1875, of selling to the prejudice of the purchaser an article not of the nature, substance, and quality of the article demanded.

Case stated by the justices at the Essex Quarter Sessions.

On the 7th of October, 1901, the appellant, W. Smithies, was convicted at a court of summary jurisdiction, in the county of Essex, under section 6 of the Sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1875, for that he did on the 15th of August, 1901, unlawfully sell to the respondent, J. T. Bridge, to his prejudice, an article of food, to wit, milk, which was not of the nature, substance, and quality of the article demanded by the purchaser. The appellant was fined £20 and costs.

On appeal to the quarter sessions the following facts were proved:

On the 15th of August, 1901, the respondent, an inspector under the Sale of Food and Drugs Acts, stopped a hand-cart on which was a churn of milk belonging to the appellant, and asked to be supplied with a pint of new milk. This on analysis was found to contain only 2·09 per cent. of fat. The analyst's certificate was as follows: "I am of opinion that the said sample contained the parts as under, or the percentages of foreign ingredients as under, viz., only 2·09 per cent. of fat, and was therefore deficient to the extent of at least 30 per cent. of the fat proper to genuine milk, seeing that normal milk of even poor quality contains at least 3·00 per cent. of fat. Observations.—No change had taken place in the constitution of the article that would interfere with the analysis."

It was further proved that the cows from which the milk had been obtained had been milked at about 4 o'clock in the morning of the 15th of August, and that the milk had not been tampered with or adulterated in any way, but was in exactly the same condition as when it came from the cows.

The cows before the 4 o'clock milking had not been milked for sixteen hours, and it appeared that the small percentage of fat in the milk was caused by the long interval which had taken place between the hour at which the milk in question was drawn from the cows and the previous milking.

The owner of the cows had been advised by veterinary surgeons that this system of milking, while it increased the quantity of milk at the morning milking, caused it to be deficient in fat, as the latter became absorbed while retained by the cows, and went to the nourishment of the calves.

The cows were not the property or under the control of the appellant, but of one Thomas Lilly, from whom the appellant purchased the milk under a guarantee of its genuineness and purity as new milk; but the appellant did not rely upon this guarantee as a defence, or in any way allege a compliance with section 25 of the Act.

The justices at quarter sessions were of opinion that there had been no adulteration of or abstraction from the milk, but that, nevertheless, the offence charged had been proved. They accordingly affirmed the conviction, but reduced the fine to £1.

By No. 657 of the Statutory Rules and Orders, 1901, made by the Board of Agriculture, dated the 5th of August, 1901, and which came into operation since the aforesaid sale of milk, namely on the 1st of September, 1901, it is provided that "Where a sample of milk (not being milk sold as skimmed, or separated, or condensed, milk) contains less than 3 per cent. of milk fat, it shall be presumed for the purposes of the Sale of Food and Drugs Acts, 1875 to 1899, until the contrary is proved, that the milk is not genuine, by reason of the abstraction therefrom of milk fat, or the addition thereto of water."

Warburton, for the appellant.—The conviction was wrong, as there had been no offence under the Act. The milk was pure new milk as taken from the cows, and was, therefore, of the nature, substance, and quality of the article demanded. There had been no abstraction from the milk or adulteration, and there was no suggestion that the mode of milking the cows had been adopted with any improper motive. At the time of the alleged offence there was no standard of genuine milk. The order made by the Board of Agriculture fixing the amount of milk fat at not less than 3 per cent. did not come into operation until the 1st of September, 1901. The Sale of Food and Drugs Acts deal with adulterated articles, and not with articles of inferior quality.

Hoyle v. Hitchman, 27 W. R. 487, 4 Q. B. D. 233.

Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J., referred to Lane v. Collins, 33 W. R. 365; 14 Q. B. D. 193.

C. E. Jones, for the respondent.—The conviction was right. The purchaser asked for new milk and the article he was supplied with did not contain the ordinary constituent parts of new milk, and the milk did not contain those parts owing to the method of milking adopted. The purchaser, therefore, had not obtained an article of the nature, substance, and quality of the article he demanded: Hewitt v. Taylor, 44 W. R. 431, [1896], 1 Q. B. 287; Dyke v. Gower, [1892], 1 Q. B. 226; 40 W. R. Dig. 6.

Cur. adv. vult.

May 2.—CHANNELL, J.—In this case the court is not entirely agreed as to the result, but I do not think that there is any great difference of opinion between us as to the principles which ought to be applied. I therefore proceed to deliver judgment first. This prosecution was brought under section 6 of the Sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1875. That section differs very considerably from the other sections of the Act. It has been decided that under that section there is no question of guilty knowledge or fraudulent intent. The only question is whether the person charged has sold something which is not of the nature, substance, and quality of the article demanded by the purchaser. The knowledge of the seller—that is, the mens rea—is not an essential element of the offence (see Betts v. Armstead, 36 W. R. 720, 20 Q. B. D. 771). A master may be convicted under it when the sale is the act of his servant—Brown v. Foot, 61 L. J. (M. C.) 110; 40 W. R. Dig. 6, and as was decided in Pearks, Gunstone, & Tee, (Limited), v. Richardson, ante, p. 286; [1902], 1 K. B. 91, a corporation may be liable for the offence: Goulder v. Rook, 49 W. R. 701, [1901], 2 K. B. 290, illustrates those propositions. There it was held that the innocent retailer of beer, which was a manufactured article with which arsenic had been accidently mixed, was liable to be convicted under this section. That was a case of a manufactured article; in the present case the article in question is a natural product. There is necessarily a certain amount of difference between the two, but, in my opinion, the same principle is applicable to both. In the present case the purchaser asked for new milk, and if he was supplied with something which he would not expect under that description, then I think the offence has been committed. In ordinary cases, if the vendor is able to prove that what he has sold as milk is the identical thing that came from the cow, without alteration or manipulation, then, unless there was some further evidence, I think that would be sufficient to show that the article sold was milk. But if the analyst's statement shows that it has not the proper constituent parts of milk, and if the seller were to prove that he had made inquiries and had discovered that the cow had some illness, and that the milk therefore was not of its normal strength and richness, then that evidence would confirm the analysis, and go to show that the thing sold was not of the nature, substance, and quality of the article demanded. It would be true that the seller had sold something which was the direct product of the cow, but of a cow which was not producing milk, but another liquid which had not the constituent parts of milk, and on those facts I think that the seller, although acting in good faith, ought to be convicted under section 6. No doubt it would be a hard case, and the justice of the case would probably be met by the infliction of a merely nominal fine, but I think there ought to be a conviction. Applying those principles to the present case, the justices have found that the milk in question did not contain the normal quantity of fat, although it was sold in exactly the same condition it came from the cow, and had not been tampered with or adulterated in any way. They have further found that this liquid was not of the nature, substance, and quality of milk. In my opinion, that is a question of fact which it was within the jurisdiction of the justices to find, and we ought not to interfere with their conclusion if there were evidence upon which they could so find. It is true that this may be a hard case, but if we do not lay down a rule in this way, it appears to me that mischief may be done in other cases.

DARLING, J.—I regret I am unable to agree. In this case the purchaser asked for new milk, and he got milk exactly as it came from the cow. It seems to me clear that if what the purchaser was given was of the nature, substance, and quality of the article he demanded, the conviction cannot be upheld. The article which was given to him was undoubtedly new, and the only question is, therefore, whether it was milk. By milk I understand cows' milk, and I do not think that a purchaser who asks for milk would expect to get asses' milk or that of any other animal. I do not think that if a purchaser asked for milk, that of a diseased cow would come within that description; for seeing that it was an article of food, the purchaser must be understood to demand milk fit for human consumption. It was contended that this was not milk because it did not contain a certain proportion of essential fats. At the time of the alleged offence there was no fixed standard as to the proportions of fat and water to be contained in milk such as now appears to have been fixed by the regulations of the Board of Agriculture dated the 5th of August, 1901. But if it was not milk, what was it? The certificate of the analyst says that normal milk of even poor quality contains at least 3 per cent. of fat, and that this did not. It is well known that some cows give richer milk than others, and particular kinds of cows are kept by some persons for that very reason.

In my opinion, as there is no standard, the vendor supplied that which he was perfectly entitled to describe as milk. It is true that this milk was not as rich as other milk, owing to the manner in which the cows were milked, but under these circumstances I do not think it is possible to say that that with which the purchaser was supplied was not new milk. I should probably not have thought it necessary to express my dissent from the conclusion at which the other members of the court have arrived if I thought that our decision would only apply to milk; but I am afraid lest it should apply to other natural products where there is no standard; and I cannot help foreseeing the difficulties that might arise in such a case if it is to be held that a natural product is not of the nature, substance, and quality of the article demanded because it does not contain all the elements in the same proportions in which they are usually found in normal examples of the natural product. It would be easy to suggest instances; for example, a purchaser who had asked for apples and had received them as they were gathered from the trees, might complain that they did not contain so much of malic acid—or of some other distinctive constituent of apples—as a chemist might declare to be normal. They would still be apples, though poor in quality.

It is, I think, a principle capable of dangerous application if it is to be laid down that a person can be convicted under section 6 of the Sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1875, for selling a natural product in the state in which it was produced.

Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J.—This is a case of some difficulty, but I have arrived at the conclusion that the conviction ought to be affirmed. The justices dealt with the matter as a question of fact, and if there is any evidence upon which they could arrive at that decision, we cannot interfere with it. I agree with my brother Darling that the real question in this case is whether that which the appellant sold was milk. In order to constitute an offence under section 6 of the Act it is not necessary, as my brother Channell has pointed out, that the seller should know the condition of the article sold. If it is not of the nature, substance, and quality of the article demanded he is liable under section 6, although he may know nothing about it. In my opinion, as the question of warranty arises here, it is impossible to distinguish between the appellant and Lilly, the man who originally provided the milk. The only question is whether there was evidence that the article sold was not of the nature, substance, and quality demanded. The analyst's certificate shows that the milk was deficient in 30 per cent. of the fat which milk ought properly to, and usually does, contain. I agree that if the evidence had been that the milk came direct from the cow, and if there were no evidence of anything abnormal in the condition of the cow or in the way in which it had been treated, the conviction would have been wrong. But the magistrates have found as a fact that although the milk came direct from the cow, yet that its abnormal condition was due to the way in which the cow had been treated, that is, that there had been the abnormal interval of sixteen hours between the milkings. The magistrates have found that the article supplied was not of the nature, substance, and quality of the article demanded because it was so deficient in fat that it could not fairly be described as milk. I do not say that I should have come to the same conclusion, but it is impossible to say that there was no evidence upon which they could so find. With regard to the recent order of the Board of Agriculture, I do not think that it purports to set up a standard of what is or is not genuine milk, but only means to say that the want of a certain percentage of fat is to be primâ facie evidence that the milk is not genuine. It is still open to a defendant to prove that the milk is in fact genuine. If, however, it turns out that the article produced, although a natural product, is the result of an abnormal condition of things, whether arising from disease or from unusual treatment of the cow, I think that that does amount to evidence upon which a magistrate may find that the article is not of the nature, substance, and quality of the article demanded. Lane v. Collins, 33 W. R. 365, 14 Q. B. D. 193, may seem to be in conflict with our decision, but that case was decided upon a special state of facts, though I am not sure that I should have arrived at the same conclusion. I am therefore of opinion that we cannot reverse the finding of fact by the justices, and that this appeal must be dismissed.

DOUGAN v. MACPHERSON. (a.)

Trustee — Purchase from beneficiary by trustee — Fiduciary position — Non-disclosure — Valuation in hands of trustee.

By the law of Scotland, as well as by the law of England, although there is no rule of law that a trustee shall not buy trust property from his cestui que trust, still, if a transaction of that kind is challenged in proper time, a court of equity will examine into it, will ascertain the value that was paid by the trustee, and will throw upon the trustee the onus of proving that he gave full value, and that all information was laid before the cestui que trust when it was sold (following Lord Cairns' opinion in Thomson v. Eastwood, 2 App. Cas. 215, at p. 236, 25 W. R. Dig. 341).

Where, therefore, a trustee purchased his cestui que trust's share in trust funds, the transaction was set aside on account of the non-disclosure of a valuation which the trustee has previously obtained.

Appeal from an interlocutor of the Second Division of the Court of Session.

The action was brought by the trustee of the sequestrated estates of James Gibson Dougan against the bankrupt's brother, to set aside a transaction whereby the bankrupt conveyed certain property to his brother.

The bankrupt's sole estate consisted of his interest under the marriage contract of his parents and under the will of his father which only vested in him under either of these instruments until the death of his mother on the 17th of April, 1898. The appellant was a trustee under both the marriage contract and the will, and after an attempt to sell to the appellant in 1897 negotiations were resumed in the following year — on the understanding that the appellant took over certain debts, paid others, and a certain sum in cash. Then followed further negotiations. Some time passed, and the bankrupt, being in great pecuniary straits, again approached the agents for the appellant. The result was that, in January, 1899, the assignation now sought to be reduced was executed, and the cash consideration of £450 was paid to the bankrupt.

In June, 1898, before the sale, the appellant obtained a valuation of the trust estate, which estimated James Dougan's share at about £3,500.

This valuation was never shown by the appellant to his brother. The debts in the cessio bonorum and the other specified debts which were discharged by the appellant amounted to nearly £2,400—the total amount paid, including the £450 cash, being £2,846.

The Lord Ordinary ordered repayment of the £450 to the appellant and the reduction of the agreement of sale, and his interlocutor was adhered to by the Second Division.

J. Crabb Watt (of the Scottish bar) and J. G. Joseph, for the appellant.

Graham Murray, L.A., and Robert Munro (of the Scottish bar) were not heard.

Earl of HALSBURY, L.C.—I cannot help saying that I feel somewhat surprised at the persistent argument that has been placed before your lordships in this case in spite of the, to my mind, perfectly clear rule of equity, which cannot be departed from, and upon which, for the first time, I believe, we are asked to place a different construction. Arguments have been addressed to your lordships as if this were a question between two persons perfectly independent of each other, each man having a right to make the best bargain he can for himself. Undoubtedly that was the view taken by the defendant here, for he frankly says so: "I do not see that fairness has anything to do with it; if a man sells at his own valuation and another man buys, it has nothing to do with fairness." He had no conception of the duty he himself owed as trustee to the person with whom he was dealing as beneficiary and cestui que trust.

The result, to my mind, is manifest. The defender acted in pursuance of what his own belief was, that he had no such duty at all, and that if he had secret information in his possession of what the value was, he might, by concealing that information, obtain £300 or £400 more than if the person with whom he was dealing had been acquainted with the value which had been placed by a skilled valuer upon this property. Certainly, it is to my mind an absolute novelty to hear it gravely argued that such a transaction as that can stand. I think every learned judge who has dealt with this question has always said that a court will regard with great suspicion such a transaction, and will call upon the trustee to show that he has given full information—that he has kept nothing back, and that he has given an adequate price. Both these things failed here: the trustee did not give an adequate price. We know now that the price was too little in any view of it. He certainly did not communicate the information he possessed; and when I say that, it is not for those who are impeaching this transaction to prove negatively; it is for the trustee to prove affirmatively that the information was given.

To my mind it is perfectly manifest that the information was not given; and I say so for two reasons. In the first place, when the defender is challenged in cross-examination to show that he did give it, he never suggests that he did, or that he had taken any means to do it, or that he had taken care that the information should reach his brother. On the contrary, he says, "If he want to find out, let him go to his own agents and not come to me" —that is the line he takes. Therefore I assume, from his own statement, that he could not prove that the knowledge was imparted to his brother. There is another reason, applying one's common sense to it. Seeing the view that he took of his rights and of his own position—namely, that he was perfectly independent, that he was transacting business with a person to whom he owed no obligation at all, am I to suppose that he went out of his way to do what no ordinary person dealing with another would do—to show him something that would enhance the value of the property he was buying? That is not the ordinary course of mankind. Although these were brothers, they do not seem to have been on particularly good terms with each other, and he himself repudiates the idea that he was giving anything out of the way to his brother. He says, "If he does not know, let him ask his own agents." Under these circumstances it seems to me that it is burning daylight to say that this transaction cannot stand. It is perfectly obvious to my mind that it must be set aside.

The only further observation I wish to make is that I am a little surprised to find that Lord Young in his judgment uses two phrases, and never gives any exposition of the sense in which he uses them. He says: "There is no legal objection to a trustee under a settlement purchasing the interest of a beneficiary so long as the trustee acts uprightly and fairly"; and later on he says: "The transaction will be held to be legal if it is proved that the trustee has acted fairly and honestly"; then the transaction will stand. That is quite true; but the whole question is, upon what facts does his lordship rely to justify the use of those adverbs "uprightly," "fairly," and "honestly"? To my mind it was neither honestly, fairly, nor uprightly done, and the transaction must be set aside.

I therefore move your lordships to dismiss the appeal with costs.

Lord ASHBOURNE.—I entirely concur. I think it is impossible to conceive a clearer case. It was the absolute and obvious duty of the defender in this case, if he thought he could maintain the transaction upon which he had entered, to have present to his mind the distinct duty which he owed to his brother. In his evidence he says, "I do not see that fairness has anything to do with it." I think that governs his entire conduct. He was thinking of the best kind of bargain he might obtain for himself. In common with all your lordships who have taken part in this hearing, I am of opinion that that is not dealing fairly—that keeping back and non-disclosure, non-bringing forward of Binnie's valuation, is a circumstance that cannot be explained and cannot be got over, and makes the case an overwhelming one for affirming the decision of the court below.

Lord MACNAGHTEN.—I entirely concur. I must say I am surprised that this action was ever defended, and I am astonished that after two adverse decisions the appellant should have had the courage to come to this House.

As far as I am aware, there is no difference whatever between the law of England and the law of Scotland in relation to the duties and obligations of trustees when they are dealing with their cestuis que trust. I do not find that the law is stated anywhere more concisely and clearly than it was in the judgment of Lord Cairns which I referred to; see Thomson v. Eastwood, 2 App. Cas., at p. 236, 25 W. R. Dig. 341.

Now, did the appellant in this case give full value? Clearly not. Did he give all the information he possessed to his brother? Most certainly he did not. He had in his pocket a valuation showing exactly what, according to the opinion of a most experienced valuator, this property was worth. He had it in his room at the time when his brother called and he did not show it to his brother; he did not even give it to the agent—the person to whom he says his brother might have gone. That was keeping back information which it was his bounden duty to have conveyed to his cestui que trust. And it does not matter in the least how or under what circumstances the information was gained; if he had that information, he was bound to place it at the disposal of his cestui que trust with whom he was dealing.

Lord SHAND.—I am of the same opinion, and I would not add a word to what has been said by your lordships if it were not that the case is one coming from Scotland. With regard to the law of Scotland, I have only to emphasise what has fallen from my noble and learned friend who has last spoken. It has not been suggested that any distinction in the law of trusts applicable to such a case as this exists between the law of England and the law of Scotland. The fiduciary relation is the same: The duties and obligations of trustees in such cases are the same in Scotland as they would be in England.

Here the trustee plainly did not realize or appreciate the duty which lay upon him to give the beneficiary full information as to his position in entering into this transaction. He makes this quite clear by his own evidence. He had in his possession—I do not care how he acquired it—the valuation which has been so much spoken of. That is a fact, and that fact he was bound to disclose when he came to transact with reference to a proposed acquisition of the share of a beneficiary. He failed to do so, and the failure is fatal in the question of the validity of the transaction.

With regard to what Lord Young said, and the expressions which have been referred to in the judgment of the Lord Chancellor, I will only say that it might have been possible to suggest that there was integrity, uprightness, and honesty on the part of the appellant if it had been a transaction between strangers, and if there had not been the relation of trustee and beneficiary subsisting between them; but the moment you bring into the case the circumstance that the appellant was a trustee having the duties lying upon him as a trustee in dealing with a beneficiary, and transacting or negotiating for the purchase of that beneficiary's share of the estate, the question of integrity and honesty drops out of the case. I do not say that he was acting fraudulently, but certainly he was acting in violation of the duty which he owed to his brother in his character of a beneficiary under the trust. Therefore I have no hesitation in saying that the case is an extremely clear one, and in concurring in the judgment proposed by your lordships.

Lord BRAMPTON.—I concur in the judgment, and I cannot help saying that I think the appeal is a frivolous and vexatious one.

Lord LINDLEY.—I am of the same opinion. I will only add that no equity lawyer, being told that that valuation was not disclosed by the trustee to his cestui que trust, could uphold this transaction for a moment.

CARISBROOK STEAMSHIP CO. (LIMITED) v. LONDON AND PROVINCIAL MARINE AND GENERAL INSURANCE CO. (LIMITED). (a.)

Insurance—Marine—General average—Charter-party—Voyage out and home—General average sacrifice on outward voyage—Liability of homeward freight to contribute.

A ship was chartered to proceed to a foreign port and there load a cargo for carriage to a home port, the chartered freight to be paid on delivery of the cargo. The ship sailed in ballast, and before she arrived at the foreign port of loading she sustained a general average loss. She proceeded on her voyage, loaded a cargo in accordance with the charter-party, carried it home, and delivered it, and the chartered freight was duly paid. In an action by the shipowners against the underwriters on ship,

Held, that the chartered freight was liable to contribute in general average.

Appeal from the judgment of Mathew, J., at the trial of an action without a jury, ante, p. 42, [1901] 2 K. B. 861.

The action was brought on a policy of marine insurance underwritten by the defendants, whereby the plaintiffs were insured for the sum of £2,000 upon the hull and machinery of the steamship Yestor. The plaintiffs sought to recover the cost of certain repairs as a loss by perils insured against. The defence was that the loss was a general average sacrifice to which the plaintiffs were liable to make contribution in respect of freight payable under a charter-party, and the defendants claimed to be entitled to deduct the amount of such contribution from the sum claimed in the action.

The policy of insurance was dated the 7th of February, 1900, and was a time policy for twelve months. By a charter-party dated the 11th of September, 1900, and made between the plaintiffs as shipowners and Messrs. Strachan as charterers, it was provided that The Yestor, which was therein described as "reported expected to leave Fleetwood about the 12th of September in ballast, calling at a Bristol Channel port for coals," should proceed to Savannah, and there, having discharged her cargo, if any, load a cargo of cotton and proceed therewith to Liverpool, Manchester, or Bremen as directed, the freight to be paid on unloading and right delivery of the cargo.

The vessel sailed on the 13th of September from Fleetwood in ballast for Savannah without exercising her option to load a cargo of coals. In the course of the voyage, and before arrival at Savannah, the vessel grounded, and in the efforts made to get her off she sustained damage to her propeller and other injuries. It was admitted that the damage to the propeller and other injuries were of the character of a general average sacrifice. She subsequently proceeded to Savannah, and, after the necessary repairs had been executed, she loaded a cargo of cotton in accordance with the charter-party and then proceeded on her homeward voyage. The cargo was duly delivered and the plaintiffs received the chartered freight in respect thereof.

(a.) Reported by F. G. RÜCKER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The question was whether, when a vessel sails in ballast under a charter-party to bring home a cargo, the chartered freight is liable to contribute in general average in respect of a general average loss incurred on the voyage out.

Mathew, J., was of opinion that the chartered freight was liable to contribute, and gave judgment for the defendants.

The plaintiffs appealed.

Carver, K.C., and D. Stephens, for the plaintiffs.—The chartered freight is not liable to contribute. The homeward freight was not being earned on the outward voyage, and was not at risk when the general average sacrifice occurred. The time for the adjustment of average was when the ship arrived at Savannah on the termination of her outward voyage, and the only contributory interests were the interests which had been at risk on that voyage. The judgment of Willes, J., in Potter v. Rankin, 16 W. R. 1049, at p. 1051, L. R. 3 C. P. 562, at p. 567, shows that in such a case as the present homeward freight is not liable to contribute to a general average loss occurring on the outward voyage. In Williams v. London Assurance, 1 M. & Sel. 318, which is relied on by the defendants, and which was followed by Mathew, J., the freight which was held liable to contribute was being earned on the outward as well as on the homeward voyage. Moreover, that case has been disapproved of by Benecke in Principles of Indemnity in Marine Insurance, p. 315; by Arnould on Marine Insurance (2nd ed.), p. 956; and by Phillips on Insurance, s. 1387; see also Abbott on Shipping (5th ed.), p. 357.

J. A. Hamilton, K.C. (F. D. Mackinnon with him), for the defendants.—The argument for the plaintiffs is based upon the assumption that there were two voyages. In truth there was only one voyage, the voyage for which the vessel was chartered—viz., to Savannah and back; and the vessel was earning the homeward freight from the time when she sailed from Fleetwood: see Barber v. Fleming, 18 W. R. 254, L. R. 5 Q. B. 59. This case is governed by Williams v. London Assurance, which was followed in Moran v. Jones, 5 W. R. 503, 7 E. & B. 523. The practice of average adjusters has always been in accordance with the rule laid down in those two cases except during a short interval when doubt was thrown on the question in consequence of the decision in The Brigella, [1893] P. 189, 41 W. R. Dig. 92. The text-book writers, Benecke, Arnould, and Phillips, do not disapprove of the principle of Williams v. London Assurance; their criticisms are mainly confined to pointing out the difficulty of apportioning the relative values of the outward and the homeward freight. Other text-book writers treat Williams v. London Assurance as established law: see Lowndes on General Average (4th ed.), p. 310; and Bailey on General Average (2nd ed.), p. 152. The principle of that case was followed in the American case of The Brig Mary, 1 Sprague's Adm. Cas. Mass. 17. The observations of Willes, J., in Potter v. Rankin were addressed to the particular facts of that case, in which no question of general average was raised.

He also referred to The Progress, Edwards's Adm. Rep. 210.

COLLINS, M.R.—This is an action on a policy of insurance, and it is brought by the owners of the steamship Yestor against underwriters on the hull. The underwriters seek to set off against the sum claimed in the action a sum which they allege to be payable by the plaintiffs, who were the owners of chartered freight as well as owners of the hull, as a general average contribution. The question is whether the chartered freight earned by the plaintiffs is the subject-matter of a general average contribution or not. By the charter-party The Yestor was chartered to sail from Fleetwood to Savannah; she was entitled to call at a port in the Bristol Channel for a cargo of coals, a right of which she did not avail herself; and, having proceeded to Savannah, she was there to load a cargo of cotton and proceed therewith to Liverpool, Manchester, or Bremen, as directed, where she was to deliver her cargo on being paid freight. She went out without any cargo, and came back safely with a cargo of cotton from Savannah to a port in England. On her way out, however, she met with a misfortune, which necessitated a general average sacrifice.

The plaintiffs bring this action on the policy to recover the amount of the loss which they so sustained, and the question is whether they, as owners of chartered freight, can be called on to contribute to the general average loss in respect of the freight. Mathew, J., held that the chartered freight had been at risk, that it had been saved by the general average sacrifice, and that it was one of the contributory factors to the general average loss. It was contended before us, in support of the appeal, by counsel for the plaintiffs, that, where a voyage out is undertaken for the purpose of earning chartered freight on the homeward voyage, the homeward chartered freight ought not to be taken into consideration as a contributory factor, if the general average loss occurs on the voyage out. They were, however, met by an old authority which was against their contention—viz., Williams v. London Assurance, decided in 1813. If that case is good law it covers the present case. In my opinion it was a stronger case than this. There the vessel was chartered for a round voyage, taking a cargo out and bringing a cargo home, and freight was payable on delivery of the homeward cargo. She was only insured for the outward voyage, and on the outward voyage she incurred a general average loss. The court, presided over by Lord Ellenborough, held that the freight was liable to contribute to general average. In the year 1857 the same point came up for consideration before the full Court of Queen's Bench in Moran v. Jones, and they either adopted the principle laid down in Williams v. London Assurance, or, as it appears to me, decided the question in the same way. Further, practically the same point had been previously decided in 1810 in the case of The Progress by Lord Stowell. There is also an American authority to the same effect, The Brig Mary.

In my opinion the rule laid down in Williams v. London Assurance is a sound working rule, and counsel for the defendants showed that the objections which have been taken to that case by the various text-book writers are not so formidable as they appear at first sight. I think that those objections are mainly directed to pointing out the difficulty which exists in estimating the proper value of the freight at risk, and are not against the taking of the freight into consideration at all. At any rate, the rule is law at this moment, and it has never been questioned in any decided case. The chief objection to the rule which the plaintiffs have been able to put forward is that which is founded on a dictum in the judgment of Willes, J., in Potter v. Rankin. But when that case is examined the dictum is seen to be merely obiter so far as concerns this case, for the facts there did not raise the point now in question for discussion. The words of Willes, J., were addressed to different circumstances from those of this case, and they ought to be read secundum subjectam materiam, and not at all as impugning the principle laid down in Williams v. London Assurance. The fact that that principle has been for so many years followed by average adjusters ought also to be taken into consideration. I think I might adopt in terms the judgment of Mathew, J., and in my opinion the appeal should be dismissed.

STIRLING, L.J.—The argument which has been addressed to us on the part of the appellants is one which would be well worthy to be weighed if it were now put forward for the first time. It is, however, admitted that, if the appellants are to succeed, the case of Williams v. London Assurance must be overruled. That case has never been judicially dissented from, it was expressly followed in Moran v. Jones, and it has been acted upon ever since till now by average adjusters, though it is true that it has been criticised by text-book writers. The only authority which the appellants have been able to cite is a dictum of Willes, J., in Potter v. Rankin. Two observations have to be made on that. First, the facts in that case were not the same as the facts in this case; there the voyages out and home were not dealt with, as they were in this case, by one and the same charter-party. Secondly, the case of Williams v. London Assurance was not cited to the court; and in my opinion they had no intention of overruling that case.

HOTHAM v. DOUGHTY. (a.)

Settled land—Tenant for life—Trustees for purposes of Settled Land Acts—Investment of capital moneys—Duty of trustees—Settled Land Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 38), s. 22 (2).

When a tenant for life under section 22 (2) of the Settled Land Act, 1882, directs trustees for the purposes of the Settled Land Act to invest capital money upon a mortgage, the trustees must be satisfied that such direction has been given upon a proper report as to the value of the property proposed to be mortgaged, or that a proper investigation of the title has been made and proper advice given as to the form of the conveyance, but on being so satisfied they are bound to comply with the direction.

This was an appeal from a decision of Cozens-Hardy, J. (reported ante, p. 150, [1901] 2 Ch. 790).

The plaintiff, Frederick William Hotham, was tenant for life of an estate called Worlingham Hall. This estate had been purchased out of capital money settled upon the plaintiff by the will of Augustus Thomas Hotham.

On the 7th of February, 1901, the plaintiff entered into a contract with the Hon. A. J. Mulholland for the sale of the estate, and it was agreed that two-thirds of the purchase-money should remain as a mortgage on the estate.

The preliminaries were all arranged, and a draft mortgage conveying the estate to the trustees of the settlement under A. T. Hotham's will had been prepared and accepted by the purchaser.

The trustees of the settlement then raised objections to the draft deed, declaring that they were entitled to check the tenant for life in the exercise of his powers under section 22 (2) of the Settled Land Act, 1882. They were also bound to satisfy themselves that proper security was offered and were entitled to the costs and charges incurred by them in procuring such satisfaction.

The plaintiff by his summons asked "that it might be declared that upon a direction under sub-section 2 of section 22 of the Settled Land Act, 1882, given by the applicant as tenant for life under the above-mentioned settlement to the respondents as trustees of the said settlement for the purposes of the Settled Land Act, 1882, to invest capital moneys in their hands as such trustees as aforesaid upon the security of a mortgage referred to in such direction, the respondents as such trustees as aforesaid are bound to invest the same accordingly, if such mortgage purports upon its face to be such a mortgage as is by the settlement or by law authorized as an investment of such capital moneys, and that they are not under obligation or entitled to satisfy themselves as to, or examine or make any inquiry as to the title to, or value of, the security included in such mortgage, and that they are not entitled to make any alteration in the form of such mortgage."

COZENS-HARDY, L.J., held that the trustees for the purposes of the Settled Land Acts must satisfy themselves as to the title and value of the proposed investment just as any ordinary trustee would.

The tenant for life appealed.

A. à Beckett Terrell and Bovill, for the plaintiff.

Eve, K.C., and H. Fellows, for the trustees.

After some argument, at the suggestion of the Court, the order was agreed to be varied as follows: Discharge order below, declare that the respondents are not bound to advance capital moneys upon the security of a mortgage unless and until satisfied that the direction of the tenant for life with reference to the property proposed to be mortgaged has been given upon a proper report as to the value of that property, and that a proper investigation of the title of the property has been had and that proper advice as to the form of the mortgage has been given, and that on being so satisfied the respondents will be bound to comply with such direction. Tax costs of all parties of this appeal as between solicitor and client and let the respondents pay and retain them out of capital moneys.

LONG EATON RECREATION GROUNDS CO. (LIMITED) v. MIDLAND RAILWAY CO. (a.)

Lands Clauses Acts—Compensation—Injuriously affecting land—Breach of restrictive covenant—Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845 (8 Vict. c. 18), s. 68.

Where a railway company, having taken land under its compulsory powers, does an act which amounts to a breach of a restrictive covenant imposed for the benefit of adjoining land, such breach may be the subject-matter of compensation for injuriously affecting the adjoining land, under section 68 of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845.

Judgment of Lawrance, J. (ante, p. 120), affirmed.

Appeal by the defendants from the judgment of Lawrance, J., at the trial of an action without a jury, ante, p. 120.

The action was brought to recover £650, the amount of compensation assessed by a sheriff's jury, under section 68 of the Land Clauses Act, 1845, in respect of lands of the plaintiffs injuriously affected by the execution of works of the defendants.

In 1884 the plaintiffs purchased an estate at Long Eaton, which they intended to develop for building purposes, and they laid out thereon two roads, one of which was called Springfield-avenue. In 1886 they sold the land between these two roads in plots to various grantees, retaining the rest of the land in their own hands, and laying it out as a recreation ground. The conveyances from the plaintiffs to the grantees contained covenants that the grantees would not erect or permit to be erected any erection or building of any kind except a fence wall not more than 2ft. high with suitable iron palisades nearer to Springfield-avenue than the line on the plan annexed to their conveyance and marked "building line," and most of the conveyances contained covenants that the grantees would not erect any buildings on the land conveyed other than private dwelling-houses with proper conveniences thereto fronting Springfield-avenue of a certain value, and would not carry on upon the land conveyed any trade or business of a noisy or offensive character.

The defendants, in pursuance of powers conferred upon them by the Midland Railway Act, 1899 (which incorporated the Lands Clauses Acts), took the land between the two roads from the grantees to whom the plaintiffs had sold it, and built thereon a railway on an embankment about 18ft. high, with a bridge across a road called Station-road, which ran at right angles to Springfield-avenue. The embankment encroached a few feet beyond the building line for its whole length, and for about two-thirds of its length the greater part of it was upon land with regard to which the restrictive covenant as to building only private dwelling-houses applied. The defendants, when they purchased the land in question, took with notice of the restrictive covenants.

By a notice in writing the plaintiffs claimed compensation under section 68 of the Lands Clauses Act, 1845, in respect of their land being injuriously affected by the execution of the defendants' works, and an inquisition was taken before the sheriff and a jury, when the jury awarded the plaintiffs £650.

Lawrance, J., held that the interference with the benefit of the restrictive covenant was an injurious affecting of the plaintiffs' land within the meaning of section 68 of the Lands Clauses Act, 1845, and that they were entitled to compensation. He therefore gave judgment for the plaintiffs for the amount assessed by the sheriff's jury.

The defendants appealed.

COLLINS, M.R.—In this case Lawrance, J., has held that the plaintiffs are entitled to the benefit of the verdict of a sheriff's jury assessing the amount of compensation payable to them in respect of the injurious affection of certain lands of theirs by reason of the making of a line of railway by the defendant company. The defendants now contend that that judgment is wrong, because, although the plaintiffs have suffered damage in fact, there has been no damage in point of law. There are two restrictive covenants by breach of which the plaintiffs' lands are said to have been injuriously affected. The first relates to that part of the land taken by the defendants which lies in front of a building line marked on conveyances granted by the plaintiffs, and prohibits the erecting thereon of any erection or building except a fence wall of the height of two feet. The second relates to the land behind the building-line and prohibits the erecting of any buildings other than private dwelling-houses. The defendants admit that what is called the toe of the embankment which they have made encroaches beyond the building line, and that that constitutes a breach of the first covenant, but they contend that the embankment itself behind the building line is not a building, and therefore does not involve any breach of the second covenant. They further say that the breach of the first covenant, being a breach of a merely restrictive covenant, is not the subject-matter of compensation under section 68 of the Lands Clauses Act. This latter point is common to the whole of the case, and raises the broad question whether the breach of a restrictive covenant can be the subject-matter of compensation.

The defendant's first contention, however, is that, supposing they are wrong on this broad question, the verdict of the sheriff's jury has awarded in a lump sum compensation which might legally be awarded and compensation which could not legally be awarded, and that so long as either part of the award cannot be supported the award is bad altogether. That contention seems to me to be clearly contrary to what was laid down by the House of Lords in Metropolitan Board of Works v. Howard. In my opinion, however, it is not necessary to consider that point in this case, for I have come to the conclusion that no distinction can be drawn in this respect between the two covenants, and I am brought to the main point, whether a breach of a restrictive covenant can be the ground for compensation claimed by an owner of land for whose benefit the restriction has been imposed. I see no reason why it cannot, if it can be shown that the restriction has been imposed for the benefit of the land retained. Here it is obvious that the intention was to protect the land remaining in the hands of the vendors. It was for that purpose that the covenants were inserted, and it is admitted that there has been a breach of the first, and, in my opinion, there has also been a breach of the second. The object of the second covenant was to secure that nothing should be built on the land except private dwelling-houses, and that covenant was broken by putting an embankment on the land, for the word "building" is not confined to bricks and mortar, but is certainly applicable to an embankment. On principle, why should not the breach of such covenant be the subject-matter of compensation? A distinction is drawn between damage to a landowner and damage to land itself. Where a restriction is put on a user of land for the benefit of neighbouring land, and the value of the neighbouring land is thereby enhanced, the withdrawal of that benefit is the subject-matter of compensation.

It seems to me that the authorities are in favour of this view. [His lordship referred to Kirby v. Harrogate School Board; In re Masters and the Great Western Railway Co.; and Manchester, Sheffield, and Lincolnshire Railway Co. v. Anderson.] I agree with the judgment of Lawrance, J., and I think that the appeal should be dismissed.

ROYAL EXCHANGE ASSURANCE CORPORATION v. SJOFORSAKRINGS AKTIE-BOLAGET VEGA. (a.)

Insurance—Marine—Time policy—Continuation clause—Time policy for more than twelve months—Specification of particular risk—Stamp Act, 1891 (54 & 55 Vict. c. 39), s. 93.

A policy of marine insurance on a ship, expressed to be for and during a period of twelve months, contained a clause which provided that, if the ship was at sea or abroad at the expiration of the policy, it was agreed to hold her covered by the policy until arrival at the port of final destination. The ship was lost upon a homeward voyage after the expiration of the twelve months. In an action on the policy,

Held, that the policy was invalid for failure to satisfy the requirements of section 93 of the Stamp Act, 1891.

Judgment of Bigham, J. (ante, p. 25, [1901] 2 K. B. 567), affirmed.

Appeal from the judgment of Bigham, J., at the trial of an action without a jury, ante, p. 25, [1901] 2 K. B. 567.

The action was brought on a policy of reinsurance. The question was whether a policy of marine insurance, expressed to be for twelve months and containing a continuation clause, was invalid under section 93 of the Stamp Act, 1891, as being a time policy for more than twelve months. The facts of the case are stated ante, p. 25.

Bigham, J., held that the policy was invalid, and gave judgment for the defendants.

The plaintiffs appealed.

J. A. Hamilton, K.C., and A. H. Chaytor, for the plaintiffs.

Scrutton, K.C., and Theobald Mathew, for the defendants.

COLLINS, M.R.—I am of opinion that the judgment of Bigham, J., must be affirmed. The action is brought on a policy of reinsurance. The plaintiffs are an insurance company, and having paid a sum of money on a policy granted by them they seek to recover a portion of that sum from the defendants, who are a Swedish insurance company, with whom they had effected a policy of reinsurance. At the trial the policy of reinsurance was tendered in evidence by the plaintiffs, but, as it was not stamped, the learned judge, acting in accordance with section 14 of the Stamp Act, 1891, took notice of the omission and proceeded to consider the question whether the policy could legally be stamped after execution; and having looked at the instrument for that purpose, he came to the conclusion that having regard to other provisions in the Act it was invalid. That is the point which we have to consider, whether this policy is or is not invalid. The question turns mainly on section 93 of the Stamp Act, which is as follows: "(1) A contract for sea insurance . . . shall not be valid unless the same is expressed in a policy of sea insurance. (2) No policy of sea insurance made for time shall be made for any time exceeding twelve months. (3) A policy of sea insurance shall not be valid unless it specifies the particular risk or adventure, the names of the subscribers or underwriters, and the sum or sums insured, and is made for a period not exceeding twelve months." Does the policy in the present case comply with the requirements mentioned in sub-section 3? It is expressed to be a reinsurance and to be subject to the same clauses, terms, conditions and continuations as the original policy; and in the margin are the words: "Continuation clause as per original policy." The original policy was for twelve months, and it contained this continuation clause: "Should the vessel be at sea or abroad on the expiration of this policy, it is agreed to hold her covered until arrival at her port of final destination in the United Kingdom or on the Continent of Europe at a pro rata daily premium to the within." The question is whether in a policy in those terms the risk is sufficiently described to satisfy sub-section 3 of section 93 of the Stamp Act. What happened to the vessel was this: She was damaged on a voyage out to America, and she put in to Quebec, where she was repaired, and after the twelve months had expired she started from Quebec on her voyage home, and was never heard of again.

The learned judge, as I have said, held that the policy was invalid. Counsel for the plaintiffs now put forward grounds on which they suggest that it may be supported. Their argument is that the policy may be considered as being, in the first place, a time policy for twelve months, the dates of the commencement and of the ending of the period being defined, and that then the continuation clause may be said to provide for a voyage after the expiration of that time, and to constitute a voyage policy. This argument puts them in the difficulty of having to answer the question where is the voyage from and where is it to. They say that the voyage is from the place wherever the vessel happens to be at the time when the time policy expires, and to the port to which the vessel ultimately comes in the United Kingdom or on the Continent. That seems to ignore the provisions of the Act, which insists on the particular risk being specified. The suggested risk might begin anywhere in the world, and it might end at any time at any port in the United Kingdom or the Continent. In my opinion such a risk is incompatible with the requirements of the section. The plaintiffs sought to distinguish this case from Home Marine Insurance Co. v. Smith, 46 W. R. 61, [1898] 2 Q. B. 351. But I think that no distinction can be drawn in their favour. I agree with Bigham, J., in holding that this policy is invalid by virtue of the statute. He pointed out the objection to the argument that this policy was in effect a time policy followed by a voyage policy—viz., that, if that were so, there would be in the same policy two contracts—one a time policy, to which ne implied warranty of seaworthiness attached; the other a voyage policy, to which such a warranty did attach. He also pointed out that the voyage was not specified, its termini not being defined. I also agree with him in thinking that this policy cannot be regarded as a time policy for twelve months followed by another time policy for an indeterminate time. The suggested second time policy would be incompatible with the statute as being too indefinite.

Then it was said that, this policy having been effected with a Swedish company and having been executed in Sweden, the parties must be taken to have intended that it should be construed by Swedish law and not by English law, and to have agreed that this particular objection should not be taken. But the policy contains this clause: "In case of any dispute under this policy the Vega Co. agree to be bound in all things by the jurisdiction and decision of the English law courts." The inference seems to me to be clear that the parties intended to be bound by English law and to have their rights under the policy measured by English law. At any rate, when the case comes into an English court, I think it is out of the power of the parties to fetter the judge in the discharge of the duty imposed upon him by the statute to take stamp objections. And I do not think any distinction can be drawn in this respect between what may be called a mere stamp objection and an objection going to the validity of the document itself. The section of the Stamp Act which this policy fails to satisfy annuls the document itself, and it follows that no suit can be maintained on it in this country. I entirely agree with the judgment of Bigham, J., and I think the appeal must be dismissed.

In re WOOD.
WOOD v. WOOD. (a.)

Will — Construction — Illegitimate children — Gift to children by name—Gift to next-of-kin of children.

A testator, after bequeathing legacies to each of his seven children by name, gave the residue of his estate to his said seven children in equal shares, the shares of each daughter to be settled as therein mentioned, with an ultimate trust in the event of a daughter dying without issue "for the persons who at the death of such daughter would have become entitled to such share under the statutes for the distribution of the personal estates of intestates." Three of the children named in the will were born before marriage. One of these, a daughter, died without issue.

Held, that the testator having by his will shown an intention that all his children should be treated as legitimate and akin to one another, the persons who were to take under the statute were to be ascertained also on that footing. Consequently the deceased daughter's share devolved upon those persons who at the time of her death would have been her next-of-kin according to the statute if she and all the other children named in the will had been legitimate.

This was an appeal from a decision of Kekewich, J. (reported ante, p. 102, [1901] 2 Ch. 578).

The testator by his will, after bequeathing legacies to each of his seven children by name, devised and bequeathed his residuary estate to trustees upon trusts for conversion and investment, and for the payment of the income to his widow during her life, and directed that after her death the trustees should stand possessed of his residuary estate in trust in equal shares for such of the said seven children as should then be living, and should have attained or might attain the age of twenty-one years, and for all or any of the issue—who being a male or males should attain the age of twenty-one years, or being a female or females should attain that age or marry—of any of his said children who should die in the lifetime of his widow leaving issue living at her death, and so that such issue should take through all degrees according to their stocks and in equal shares the share or shares which their parent would have taken if living at the time aforesaid, and so that no issue should take whose parents should be living at the time aforesaid and capable of taking. He also directed his trustees to retain the legacy or other bequest, and also the share of his residuary trust estate which any daughter of his might take under those provisions and to hold the same upon trust to pay the income of each such daughter's legacy and share to her during her life for her separate use during any coverture and after her death in case she should leave a husband surviving her, upon trust to pay the income to the husband for life or any less period if she should so direct or appoint, and subject thereto upon trusts for the benefit of her children; and if there should be no such child then in trust for the persons who at the death of such daughter would have become entitled to such share under the statutes for the distribution of the personal estates of intestates in case she died possessed thereof without having been married, such persons taking as tenants in common in the shares in which they would have taken under such statutes.

After the death of the testator it was discovered that three of his children were born before his marriage.

The widow of the testator died in December, 1900, and six of the seven children survived her.

One of the testator's illegitimate children, a daughter, died in January, 1901, without having had any issue or exercised the power of appointment given to her by the will in favour of her husband (who survived her).

A summons was taken out by the plaintiff, one of the legitimate children, raising the question whether the legacy and share of residue of the deceased daughter upon her death without issue (1) devolved upon the persons who would have been her next-of-kin at the time of her death in case she and the other persons described in the will as the testator's children had all been legitimate, or (2) passed to her legal personal representative as if it had been absolutely bequeathed to her, or (3) became divisible amongst the persons entitled in right of the testator's widow and legitimate children as if he had died intestate in relation thereto.

Kekewich, J., held that the illegitimate children could not be treated as legitimate for the purpose of benefiting those who would have been their next-of-kin had they been legitimate. He held that there was an absolute gift to the deceased daughter and that her legal personal representative took her legacy and share of residue.

The plaintiff appealed.

Warrington, K.C., and Chubb, for the appellant.—The testator's meaning is that the share of a daughter is to be held upon trust for those persons who would be her next-of-kin, as if she had died unmarried. The testator has said already in his will that all his children are to be treated as legitimate. He intends, therefore, that the daughter's share is to go to the persons who would have been her next-of-kin if she had died unmarried and been legitimate, and the reference to the Statute of Distributions ought not to be allowed to defeat this intention.

VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J.—In this case Romer and Stirling, L.JJ., take the view that the decision of Kekewich, J., cannot be supported. I confess that although I am not prepared to differ from that conclusion, I shall concur in it with great hesitation. I agree with Kekewich, J., that if we adopt the construction of this will which we are invited by the appellant to adopt we are making a distinct step in advance of any that has been heretofore taken. I start here with the proposition which is clearly laid down by Lord Halsbury in In re Jodrell, that, inasmuch as it is lawful if you choose to use apt words to give legacies to illegitimate children and also to the next-of-kin (so called) of illegitimate children, you must always have regard to the intention of the testator though he may not have used apt words—that is, though he may have used words which would be apt only in the case of legitimate children or the next-of-kin of legitimate children—if once you are satisfied upon the terms of the will and within its four corners that it was the testator's intention to include illegitimate children. Here, starting with that proposition, I want to see whether in the present will the testator has used such words as to make it, I do not say absolutely certain, but reasonably clear that he intended by the words which he has used to give this property after the deaths of his illegitimate children respectively without issue to the persons who would have been the next-of-kin of those children if they had been legitimate. It is said that that is so in this case because this is one of the cases in which a testator has created a dictionary for himself and you must read his will in the light of that dictionary. It is said that if you look at the earlier part of the will the testator speaks of his children illegitimate as well as legitimate under the general term "children," and that you must read the will with the term "children" having this meaning. I agree. But then it is said that a wider connotation must be put upon the word, that it not only includes illegitimate as well as legitimate, but that it means that those persons whom the testator describes as children shall for all purposes be treated as legitimate. Therefore when he speaks of "the persons who at the death of such daughter would have become entitled to such share under the statutes for the distribution of the personal estates of intestates in case she had died possessed thereof without having been married," you must read that definition as not merely referring you to the statute, but as if the words had run on "and in case she had been legitimate." I think this is a very material step in advance. We are invited because of the condition in fact of the testator's family, to give to his will a meaning altogether different from and inconsistent with the real words of the will. The real words of the will refer you to the statute as the index to those persons who are to receive these shares in the distribution of the testator's estate. If you do refer to the statute these persons whom the appellant represents who are not next-of-kin and are not within the statute at all would take no share. But instead of referring to the statute, what you are to do, according to the construction urged on us, is to give this property to persons who, if the children referred to had not been illegitimate but legitimate, would have been entitled. It does seem to me that that is going a step further than any case has yet gone. But it is said you must do that because if you do not you defeat what is the obvious and the only possible intention of the testator. I do not know how far that doctrine is to be carried. Speaking for myself, I cannot help thinking that you might have words defining a class with such accuracy and particularity that it would be impossible to override them, on the ground that if you construe those words strictly there would never have been any class who could take, and that the testator if he was versed in the law must have known that that was so. It seems to me always possible that the mistake has arisen from the testator's ignorance of the law, that he never had any intention of using the words in any other than their natural meaning, because he never knew that there was any necessity for doing so. In such a case it seems to me that it would be impossible to say that the testator intended to create a dictionary for himself, and in the present case it does seem to me a strange thing to say that because the testator intended to create a dictionary for himself in respect of the words "child" or "children," he also intended to create a dictionary for himself in respect of the word "next-of-kin." However, in spite of these considerations, though I think the case is difficult one, I have persuaded myself to concur in the judgment of my learned brethren. In will cases one is so often compelled to do violence to that which one believes to be the intention of the testator that it is pleasant to give effect to what I have no doubt was the intention of this testator—viz., that his children one and all should stand on the same footing.

ROMER, L.J.—This is a curious case, but I think the appeal ought to succeed. The testator by his will with regard to each share of his illegitimate children has declared that the share shall be held by the trustees upon certain trusts. In the case of a daughter the trusts are, after her death without issue, "for the persons who at the death of such daughter would have become entitled to such share under the statutes for the distribution of the personal estates of intestates in case she died possessed thereof without having been married, such persons taking as tenants in common in the shares in which they would have taken under such statutes." To my mind it is clear upon this will that the testator intended that some persons should be capable of taking under that gift over in the event of the daughter's dying without issue. The question is, What persons are to take? It is clear that the testator could not have intended to provide by means of that gift for persons who could have been ascertained under the statute, treating the daughter as illegitimate, because on that footing he could have attached no meaning at all to the gift. I decline to say that the testator had no meaning in making that gift. I think he had a meaning. Then what does he mean? If he intended to treat the daughters as legitimate, has he shown what he intended by this gift? Can I have any doubt as to what he meant? In my opinion, no one can have any doubt as to what the testator meant here. I am able to give effect to his intention, and I resolve to do so. The testator has throughout his will shown his intention that all his children shall be treated as legitimate, and you are to ascertain the persons who are to take under the statute by treating all the children as legitimate. On that footing alone can you give effect to what the testator has shown to be his intention. On that footing the difficulty disappears, and the will becomes clear. I think, therefore, that the appeal ought to succeed.

STIRLING, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. [His lordship read the will, and continued:] One of the testator's illegitimate daughters has died without issue and the question arises as to the effect to be given to that ultimate gift. The testator refers to these seven persons as his children: it follows from that that they have kin—they are akin to one another and akin to the testator himself. We have now to inquire who are the persons who on the death of a daughter would become entitled to her share under the Statute of Distributions. [His lordship read the statute, and continued:] Those are the persons whom the testator points out as the objects of his bounty in case one of his daughters dies without leaving issue. In ascertaining the next-of-kin thus referred to who are meant by the testator, are we, because the testator has adopted this reference to the statute as a means of expressing his own intention, to treat the illegitimate daughters as having no next-of-kin? It seems to me plain that the intention of the testator was that on the death of a daughter persons would be found who should succeed to her share. The testator treats all his children as akin to one another, and the persons he means to take are the persons who are next-of-kin in the view, not that these illegitimate children are akin to nobody, but that they are akin to their brothers and sisters. Though this decision goes further than any case yet decided, I think it falls, nevertheless, within the authority of the cases cited to us on behalf of the appellants. For these reasons I think this appeal should be allowed.

RANDALL (LIMITED) v. THE BRITISH AND AMERICAN SHOE CO. (a.)

Company—Name painted or affixed on shop—Breach of Companies Act, 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 89), ss. 41, 42 —Right to protection—Injunction.

In an action for an injunction to restrain defendants from using a certain trade-name, similar to one used by plaintiff company, although not their corporate name, the defendants pleaded that plaintiffs having contravened sections 41 and 42 of the Companies Act, 1862, were precluded from any right to the protection of their trade-name.

Pearks, Gunston, & Tee (Limited) v. Thompson, Talmey, & Co., 18 Rep. Pat. Cas. 185, followed.

The plaintiffs were H. E. Randall (Limited), who owned and carried on a number of shops for the sale of boots and shoes. The articles sold in these shops were of British manufacture.

In 1897 the plaintiffs determined to open a shop for the sale of American goods, and in March of the same year a shop was opened in Regent-street under the name of "The American Shoe Co." This name was used to distinguish the shop from the other shops carried on by plaintiffs exclusively for the sale of British goods.

It appeared that the plaintiffs had not, as far as their Regent-street shop was concerned, at first complied with the requirements of the Companies Act, 1862, ss. 41 and 42, which provides (inter alia) for the painting and affixing of the name of the company on the outside of every place of business, and on the official publications, invoices, and receipts of the company. Their attention being called to this, they had immediately painted their corporate name under their trade-name of "The American Shoe Co." There had also been other omissions to comply with the above sections, which had been remedied.

The defendants were the British and American Shoe Co., previously known as "The London American Shoe Co.," who carried on a business at Putney.

This was an action for an injunction to restrain the defendants from using the name "British and American Shoe Co." or any other name so nearly resembling the name of "The American Shoe Co." as to lead to the belief that it was the name of a business connected with that of the plaintiffs.

Vernon Smith, K.C., and Gatey, for the plaintiffs.

Micklem, K.C., and Wright Taylor, for the defendants, said that the omission of the plaintiffs to comply with sections 41 and 42 of the Companies Act, 1862, precluded them from any right to the protection of the name "The American Shoe Co." Plaintiffs had not acquired the name by lawful user, and the court would not protect it: Leather Cloth Co. v. American Leather Cloth Co., 12 W. R. 289, 4 De. G. J. & S. 137, 142, 13 W. R. 873, 11 H. L. Cas. 523.

SWINFEN EADY, J., held that, subject to the question of law raised, the plaintiffs, had established their right to an injunction. It remained to be decided whether the plaintiffs were precluded from obtaining relief by any breaches of sections 41 and 42 of the Companies Act, 1862. His lordship was satisfied that such breaches had been made inadvertently. Did they preclude the right of the plaintiffs to an injunction? It was said that the present case was to be distinguished from the case where a company, having purchased an old business, continued to carry it on under the old name without adding their own. Here the plaintiffs by their own exertions had created and made famous the name and reputation of "The American Shoe Co." He could see no reason for drawing a destinction between the two cases. The Companies Act, 1862, ss. 41 and 42, imposed certain penalties on a company for non-compliance with its provisions, but these penalties did not include the forfeiture of its goodwill to any dishonest person who chose to steal it. In his opinion the present case was governed in principle by Wright v. Horton, 36 W. R. 17, 12 App. Cas. 371, and in that respect he followed the decision of Farwell, J., in Pearks, Gunston, & Tee (Limited) v. Thompson, Talmey, & Co., 18 Rep. Pat. Cas. 185.

EAST STONEHOUSE DISTRICT LOCAL BOARD v. WILLOUGHBY. (a.)

Limitation statutes—Leaseholds—User of adjoining land—Accretion to holding—Statute of Limitations (3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 27), s. 7.

A. was the tenant of two plots of land from the same landlord. He executed in his lifetime a deed directing that after his death the two plots should be held by the trustees on different trusts. He died in 1848. The cestui qui trustent of the one plot used and occupied the other plot without acknowledgment or payment of rent for over forty years.

Held, that their occupation was not that of trespasser or tenant at will, but was under the trusts of the will, and that consequently the Statute of Limitations did not run as against the landlord.

Action without a jury.

The facts of the case and the arguments of counsel appear sufficiently from the judgment.

B. 4; Burroughs v. M'Creight, 1 Jo. & Lat. 290.

May 14.—CHANNELL, J., read the following judgment: This is an action of ejectment which came on for trial before me at the last assizes at Exeter, and the points of law arising in it have since been argued on further consideration before me in London. Stated shortly, the question is, what is the effect of the parties beneficially interested in the leases of a plot of land at East Stonehouse having for many years without payment of rent or acknowledgment used and occupied two pieces of land outside their proper boundary and included in the parcels demised by leases of an adjoining plot. The leases were under the same landlord, and each lease had been renewed several times without any notice being taken of the fact that the occupation did not correspond with the parcels described as demised. The case is further complicated by the fact that for a considerable part of the time the terms created by the leases were legally vested in the same persons as trustees. It is necessary to state the facts precisely.

In the year 1819 Lord Mount Edgcumbe granted to James Moir a lease for ninety-nine years, provided three named persons lived so long, of a plot of land at East Stonehouse described by its dimensions and by reference to a plan. The lease was at a small rent, and was renewable at a fixed fine if the lessee applied for the renewal within a limited time after the first life dropped. This lease has been renewed on similar terms in 1835, 1856, and in 1890, and the plot of land demised has always been described as of the same dimensions, and the plans on the leases have been identical, except as regards the names of the occupiers of the lands adjoining. It is a quadrangular plot, bounded by four straight lines, and the dimensions being given in the plans it is quite easy to identify. On the plot of land so demised James Moir built a foundry, and in the argument before me this plot was called the foundry plot, and the leases of it the foundry leases, and it will be convenient to use the same terms in my judgment.

In 1831 Lord Mount Edgcumbe granted to the same James Moir a similar lease for ninety-nine years, subject to three lives, of land adjoining the foundry plot. This same plot was called in the argument before me the stable plot, as at one time there was a stable on it, and the leases of the plot were called the stable leases. The original stable lease was renewed in 1856 and 1894 and 1898, and the description of the plot demised and the plans on the lease were always the same. The stable plot abutted on the foundry plot on the north and west sides of the foundry plot. On the west side of the foundry plot, and extending all along that west side there was a small strip included in the stable plot. On the north side of the foundry plot was the larger portion of the stable plot; on the east side of both plots was a street called Phœnix-street, and on the south side of the foundry plot, and along the south end of the strip, was a road called Buckingham-place.

Prior to the year 1843 (to which date the memory of one of the witnesses called before me went back) James Moir was using the strip of the stable property, which was on the west side of the foundry property, as a yard in which he stored articles from the foundry. There was then a wall at the northern end of the strip dividing it from the rest of the stable property, then used as a garden, in which wall there had at one time been a door into the garden, but in 1843 the door had been bricked up, and it has remained so ever since. That strip has from that time always been occupied with the foundry as a storage yard, and there has been no access from it to the other part of the stable property except through the foundry, and it is one of the two pieces sought to be recovered in this action.

James Moir also had erected, prior to 1843, on the stable property on the Phœnix-street side some workshops or sheds, which he used in connection with the foundry. The other land and buildings the subject of this present action are at this spot. They now consist of a smith's shop, which adjoins the foundry plot, and a loft and room used as a pattern shop, which is over a stable. The stable is in the possession of the plaintiffs, who are the present lessees of the stable plot, but the smith's shop and loft or pattern shop are in the possession of the defendants, the present lessees of the foundry plot. According to the recollection of the older witnesses there have been some slight alterations in these buildings since they first recollect them in James Moir's possession, but this, I think, is immaterial.

In 1842 James Moir, being then the lessee both of the foundry plot and of the stable plot, and also of two other leaseholds, made a settlement bearing date the 12th of January, 1842, whereby he assigned all the four leaseholds and also the stock-in-trade and chattels used in the foundry to William Lane to hold on such trusts as he should thereafter by deed appoint, and until appointment for himself. By deed dated the 18th of November, 1846, he executed this power of appointment. This deed requires careful consideration. It was assumed in the argument by counsel on both sides that by this deed the beneficial interest in the foundry lease was given on one set of trusts, and the beneficial interest in the stable lease on another set of trusts, and after carefully considering the deed I have come to the conclusion that this assumption of counsel is correct, but I think it is material to notice, as accounting possibly for what has occurred, that it might quite well be contended that the deed gave all of the premises, whether in the one lease or the other, upon which the foundry business was then being actually carried on upon the one set of trusts, and the residue of the property only upon the other set of trusts. This deed of 1846 does not recite the leases, but only the previous deed of settlement of the 12th of January, 1842, and other apparently similar settlements of other property of the same date.

The settlor first appoints all the properties to himself for his life, and makes appointment of premises other than those to which this action relates, and then appoints "all that piece or parcel of land situate in Phœnix-street wherein the said J. Moir, party thereto, carried on his business of an iron founder together with all buildings and erections thereon upon trust to pay the rents and profits thereof to John Moir, son of him the said James Moir, or permit him to occupy the same during his life or until he should assign or charge his interest," and on the determination of John Moir's interest upon trust to assign the same to the children of John Moir on their attaining twenty-one. He then directed a sale of the stock-in-trade, &c., of the iron foundry business, but gave John Moir the right to purchase it at a valuation. No doubt, therefore, he contemplated that John Moir should carry on the business of the foundry, and the words which he used in appointing the property are capable of passing all the land and buildings on which the business of the foundry was actually carried on without reference to the title being under one lease or the other. He made no express appointment of the stable property, but he appointed the residue of the properties in the settlement upon trust to divide the rents and profits between a grandson and two married daughters for their lives and afterwards for their children. The deed then went on as follows: "And the said James Moir, party hereto, doth hereby further appoint that the smith's shop and stable erected on the garden situate in Phœnix-street shall be rented by the said John Moir so long as the said John Moir shall see fit at the yearly rent of £20, the said John Moir paying all rates and taxes in respect of the same."

As the smith's shop (which is the same smith's shop as is now in dispute) was clearly then used with the foundry business, and was by this clause as to renting clearly assumed not to have been appointed to John Moir, I think the true construction of the deed must be to give only so much of the foundry property as was included in the foundry lease to John Moir. Further, there is no provision for apportioning the rent or the sums payable on renewal under the stable lease as there should have been if that property was to be divided. Probably it was intended that John Moir should rent all of the property used with the foundry, but included in the parcels demised by the stable lease. But the settlor seems to have omitted the strip to the west of the foundry, and it looks as if he had been under the impression that the only part of the stable property used with the foundry was the smith's shop and stable. There is no evidence of any rent having been paid by James Moir for the smith's shop, nor is there any evidence of the stable having ever been occupied by John Moir. He did, however, occupy, and so did his children, both the smith's shop now in question which is what he was to be allowed to rent with the stable, and also the pattern shop over the stable, and the strip towards Buckingham-place which is not mentioned in the deed of 1846 at all.

James Moir died in 1848, and John Moir the son carried on the foundry business and died in 1853. His widow then carried it on, and subsequently one of his daughters, Mrs. Triscott. The widow took nothing herself under the settlement, and no doubt she was acting as trustee and manager for her children, some of whom were certainly under age.

On the 12th of March, 1856, the foundry lease was renewed and on the 27th of August, 1856, the stable lease was renewed, each new lease being granted to the settlement trustees, and it seems important, therefore, to see what was the character of the possession which John Moir's widow had in 1856 of the two pieces of land in dispute. Mr. Foote, for the defendant, contended that as to both pieces she was either a trespasser or at most a tenant at will. Even if John Moir had been tenant of the smith's shop the right to occupy that as tenant seems to be given only to him personally "so long as he shall think fit," and therefore a tenancy under the strict terms of the appointment would end at his death. How John Moir and subsequently his widow came to be allowed to retain possession of the two pieces of land in dispute without payment of any rent to the trustees cannot now be ascertained for certain. I, however, draw the inference from such evidence as I had before me that it was by mistake and that the plans on the leases were never examined. As regards the smith's shop, no doubt the terms of the clause as to renting that and the stables ought to have drawn attention to the fact that it was included in the demise of the stable property, but this was possibly overlooked. It is of course possible that at first rent was paid and that the payment was discontinued, but there is no evidence of it, and as the stable was not occupied the £20 would not be payable. I am therefore not justified in assuming rent to have been paid or that any actual tenancy was created. At the same time the occupation of those pieces cannot be said to have been a trespass. It must have been by the permission in fact of the trustees, though that permission was probably given in the mistaken belief that the occupation was in accordance with the trust though in fact it was not. I shall have to consider presently what the condition of things must be taken to be at the time of these renewals in 1856, but will continue the history of the case first.

The leases granted by way of renewal, both in 1856 and at other times, appear always to have been in the same form. They referred to the former lease and stated that the new lease was granted in consideration of the term granted by the previous lease being "merged by the re-grant of the same tenement to the lessees in whom the whole legal interest in the residue of the said term is now vested as is hereby covenanted and warranted by the said lessees." Subsequently to 1856 Mrs. Triscott, a witness called at the trial, a daughter of James Moir, and granddaughter of James Moir, the settlor, bought or succeeded to the beneficial interests of her brothers and sisters in the foundry property, and she carried on the foundry business, herself occupying and using the disputed premises. There was no evidence (unless the recital which I am about to mention can be considered evidence) that she ever got an assignment from the trustees of the legal estate in the foundry term, but by deed dated the 24th of July, 1890, Lord Mount Edgcumbe granted to her a new lease of the foundry plot by the old description and plan. There was, it is true, an inaccurate statement in the plan as to the land immediately adjoining the west and north boundary being occupied by certain persons, when in fact the disputed pieces which were in Mrs. Triscott's own occupation, intervened, but this, I think, is quite immaterial. This deed contains the same statement as to Mrs. Triscott being entitled to the whole legal interest which I have quoted above. This is the only kind of evidence that she ever had the legal estate. It was stated by Mr. Clavell Salter in opening the case, and I understand it to be admitted, though I have no note of an express admission, that all three lives in the lease of the 12th of March, 1856, had dropped before the 24th of July, 1890, so that Lord Mount Edgcumbe was not bound to grant a renewal unless he pleased; and under these circumstances he would not very strictly investigate Mrs. Triscott's title. The date when the last of the three lives in the lease of March, 1856, dropped was not stated; but I assume it to have been in the year 1890, shortly before the new lease was granted. Since the case was argued I have endeavoured to get further information on this point and on some other points which appeared left in doubt, but I am informed that there are reasons why I cannot have any further information now. Down to this time (July, 1890) the legal interest in the two terms created in 1856 was in the trustees of the settlement unless they had at some previous time executed to Mrs. Triscott the assignment to which she was entitled, which I think they never did. About the time of renewing the lease in 1890 Mrs. Triscott let the foundry to the present defendants, and subsequently sold it to them. In 1893 an action was commenced for the partition of the settled property, and in the judgment in that action it was, amongst other things, directed that the lease of the stable property of August, 1856, should be sold. Before the sale (probably by direction of the court) the then trustee, one Taylor, took a renewed lease from Lord Mount Edgcumbe, dated the 7th of December, 1894, in the usual form, and with the old description and plan. This new lease was sold by auction to one Saltern, and the assignment to him is dated the 25th of June, 1896. At or about the time of this sale by auction the fact of the occupation by Mrs. Triscott or the defendants of the premises in dispute in this action appears to have been first discovered, and in the assignment dated the 25th of June, 1896, it is recited that the plan on the lease of 1894 was inaccurate, and the assignment is made "of so much of the land demised by the lease of December, 1894, as is in the occupation of Messrs. Goad" (which would not include the disputed portions) "or is now subject to the said lease." It is obvious that the trustee was unwilling to assert his title to the disputed pieces, but nevertheless he assigned such title to them as he had by the lease of 1894. Saltern renewed the lease of 1894 by taking a new lease from Lord Mount Edgcumbe dated the 7th of July, 1898. This was done by the old description and plan and no doubts or inaccuracy of the plan were recited. Then on the 14th of March, 1901, Saltern assigned to the present plaintiffs, who bought for the purpose of widening Phœnix-street; and they shortly afterwards, on the 18th of July, 1901, commenced this action.

Thus, the defendants and their predecessors in title to the beneficial interest in the foundry have had actual possession without acknowledgment of the disputed premises from 1848, when James Moir died. In 1896 the error was discovered, but even then no claim seems to have been made on the defendants; it appears to have been assumed that the error lay in the plans on the leases. Thus the period of undisputed possession seems to have been upwards of fifty years. During all that time the now disputed premises were as between the persons beneficially entitled to the foundry property and those beneficially entitled to the stable property treated as included in the former property and not in the stable property, but all the time Lord Mount Edgcumbe was receiving the rents to which he was entitled, and in every renewal was treating the disputed premises as part of the stable property.

Under these circumstances I should be glad to be able to decide the case by the doctrine commonly referred to as a lost grant—that is, the rule which says that on long continued user or possession being proved anything requisite to give that user and possession a legal origin ought to be presumed by the court. This doctrine has long been known to our law, but in recent times it has been applied more widely and to a greater variety of cases than formerly. It is, in my opinion, a most useful doctrine, and enables the court to avoid interfering with user and possession in cases not covered by the Statutes of Prescription and Limitation, though within the mischief which these statutes were intended to remedy. In particular it can be applied between termors when there is a difficulty in applying the statutes owing to the freeholder not being bound. In the present case there is no plea founded on this doctrine, but there is a plea that the defendants are in possession, which would be sufficient to raise any legal right to retain possession though not an equitable one. In this case it would be necessary in order to justify the present possession of the defendants to infer from the possession of their predecessors during the currency of leases now expired some binding engagement to give the benefit of the renewed lease, which at the most would create a trust, so the point would not be open on the present pleadings without amendment. Further, there might be a difficulty owing to the fact that the stable property was until 1896 in trust, and probably the cestuis que trustent were incapable of making a grant. I am by no means sure that these difficulties would be insuperable. There is a very wide arbitration clause in the settlement, and I am by no means sure that it would not be legitimate to infer an award settling the doubts arising on the construction of the settlement, and justifying the occupation which has taken place. But I feel that I ought not to decide the case on the ground of any such presumption, even if on a full consideration I thought it could be so decided, because the point has not been raised (probably for very good reason) by counsel for the defendants, and consequently I have not heard any arguments against it from the counsel for the plaintiffs, and moreover, it is not open on the pleadings as they stand.

The defendants relied entirely on the Statute of Limitations for their defence, and the first point which has to be considered is when, if at all, the statute began to run against Lord Mount Edgcumbe, and in order to succeed the defendants must make out that it began to run at or before the making of the lease of the 27th of August, 1856, for that lease subsisted until 1894, that is, until twelve years before the action was commenced. This question seems to me to depend mainly on the character of the possession at that time of the disputed premises by the widow of John Moir, representing, as she did, Mrs. Triscott and her other children. I am unable to come to the conclusion that there was any tenancy in fact existing to the trustees, and therefore the case of Corpus Christi College, Oxford v. Rogers, 49 L. J. Q. B. 4, 28 W. R. Dig. 133, as explained in Ecclesiastical Commissioners of England and Wales v. Rowe, 29 W. R. 159, 5 App. Cas. 736 (see per Lord Selborne, at p. 743), does not apply. But I am equally unable to come to the conclusion that Mrs. Triscott and her brothers and sisters (in whose right Mrs. Moir was carrying on the business) were trespassers. In Ecclesiastical Commissioners of England and Wales v. Rowe, at the time of the surrender and regrant of the lease the allotment in question was in the possession of a mere "trespasser and disseisor," as Lord Selborne said at p. 742, and that possession could not possibly be considered to be the possession of the lessees who surrendered. Consequently, during the interval of time which the Lord Chancellor held must exist between the surrender and regrant, the allotment was being held against the lessor by the trespasser, and the right of action against him accrued to the lessor. In the case before me Mrs. Moir and her children were in possession of the foundry under the trusts of the settlement, and though in fact those trusts in their favour did not extend to the disputed parcels, yet Mrs. Moir clearly got the possession which she had of them by reason of her possession of the trust property. Under these circumstances the disputed parcels would, in my opinion, be held under the trust they would devolve according to the trusts, and they would be an accretion to the trust property on the same grounds as they would be an accretion to the demised property if it were a case of tenancy. I think under these circumstances the proviso at the end of section 7 of the Statute of Limitations (3 & 4 Will. 4. c. 27) applies, and that Mrs. Triscott cannot be considered a tenant at will to the trustees within the meaning of that section. Mr. Foote contended that the proviso only applied as regards land of which the trustee was in fact trustee for the cestui que trust, and said by way of illustration that it could not apply if a man encroached in Middlesex on some land of a person who happened to be trustee for him of land in the county of Devon. That would be so, but in this case, where the possession is obtained by reason of the trust, I think it would be otherwise. It seems to me that, when the trustee surrendered the stable lease in August, 1856, and took a new lease, he had the possession in law and effectually surrendered it to the lessor to enable him to make the regrant, as Lord Selborne says (see top of p. 742), out of his estate in possession just as much as he did when he surrendered in March, 1856, the lease of the foundry of which Mrs. Triscott or her mother was then in the actual physical possession. Even if there were a tenancy at will, I am not sure that it would not be determined by her surrender, though created again after the regrant. It would be so determined, in my opinion, if the supposed tenant at will had notice of the surrender. I think, therefore, on these grounds that the statute did not begin to run against Lord Mount Edgcumbe in 1856.

This point is nearly she same as the second point raised by Mr. Upjohn, that the existence of the trust in itself prevented the statute running. This point he based on the cases of Lester v. Pickford, 13 W. R. 827, 34 Beav. 576, and Knight v. Bowyer, 6 W. R. 565, 2 De G. & J. 421. I agree with Mr. Foote that it is possible to distinguish each of those cases. In Lister v. Pickford the trustees were themselves in actual receipt of the rents and profits but they accounted for these rents to the wrong person. It was held that the persons for whom the trustees really were trustees were not barred by the erroneous payment, because a trustee could not by any act of his own make his rightful possession adverse to the real cestui que trust. Here the trustees were not in possession, so that case is not directly in point, though it is rather near to the present. Again,

Knight v. Bowyer proceeded on section 25 of the statute, as to express trusts. That section says that when land is vested in a trustee as an express trust, the right of the cestui que trust or any person claiming through him to bring an action against the trustee or any person claiming through him shall be deemed to have accrued only when the land shall have been conveyed to a purchaser for valuable consideration, and then only as against such purchaser and anyone claiming through him. Now, here there was an express trust of all the stable property, and the disputed parts were included in that trust. But the section only prevents the statute running in favour of persons claiming through the trustee otherwise than by purchase for value. Mrs. Triscott was certainly not a purchaser for value from the trustee, but it is not clear that she was a person claiming through the trustee. If she had been a mere stranger to the trust encroaching on the trust property and claiming adversely both to the trustee and the cestui que trust, the fact of the trust existing would not prevent the statute running in her favour. The question whether she was a person claiming through the trustee is nearly, if not quite, the same question as that which I have already discussed as to whether her possession could be considered the possession of the trustee for the purpose of the surrender, and if I am right in the view I have taken on that question I think she must also be considered as a person claiming through the trustee within the meaning of section 25. In fact, all these questions turn on whether Mrs. John Moir can be considered to have been for a year prior to August, 1856, a tenant at will of the disputed premises to her trustee within the meaning of section 7.

Assuming, however, that the statute did begin to run in 1856 against Lord Mount Edgcumbe, so that he would be barred when his tenant of the stable property was barred, still the statute ran in favour of another tenant (or the cestui que trust of another tenant, which I think is the same thing) of the other property, and all the authorities show that a presumption would arise that the encroachment was an accretion to the holding. The result therefore would, in my opinion, be that if Lord Mount Edgcumbe had a right of entry in August, 1856, on these two disputed parcels, these parcels would, when the statute ran out, be presumed to be held with the foundry property, and when that lease determined or was surrendered he could resume possession. That lease did not determine until the 24th of July, 1890, or shortly before, when the third life is said to have dropped. He would then have acquired a new right of possession and it would be within twelve years of this action unless the third life dropped before the 18th of July, 1889. Mr. Foote answers this point as to accretion to the tenancy by referring to the observations of all the Lords Justices in Attorney-General v. Tomline, 28 W. R. 870, 15 Ch. D. 150, to the effect that this presumption of accretion to the holding is a question of fact, and if on the facts proved in any particular case the landlord and tenant are shown to have "so conducted themselves as to show that the landlord treated the encroachment as not enuring for his benefit" then the presumption would be rebutted. I quote from the judgment of Thesiger, L.J., at end of p. 161; but the language of the other Lord Justices is quite to the same effect. In that case it was said that even if the presumption applied to copyholds the surrender of the original holding and the regrant of it without the encroachment would be sufficient to rebut the presumption. That was in many respects a very different case to the present; but adopting Thesiger, L.J.'s, words I am quite unable to come to the conclusion that Lord Mount Edgcumbe ever recognized this encroachment as not enuring for his benefit. I am convinced that neither he nor his advisers (who probably alone knew anything at all of the matter) ever for one moment recognized any independent title in Mrs. Triscott to these portions of the property. In all probability they assumed without inquiry that she was surrendering to Lord Mount Edgcumbe all she held, and although Lord Mount Edgcumbe cannot be in a better position owing to his ignorance than he otherwise would be, yet he cannot be assumed to have voluntarily given up any of his rights, presumptive or otherwise. Assuming, however, as probably I ought to assume, that he knew the facts as to Mrs. Triscott's occupation, and knew that in consequence he was in a position to claim that she had during the term which was being surrendered held the portions now in dispute as an addition to her proper holding, I do not think he was in a position to regrant them to her, and therefore his not including them in the renewed lease raises no presumption that he did not intend to treat them as having been added to her former holding while it continued. On his acquiring from Mrs. Triscott on the surrender of her term the right to the possession of these portions, the holder of the stable lease would, as it seems to me, become again entitled to them as against Lord Mount Edgcumbe; and in fact he so dealt with the matter, for in 1894 he regranted the whole of the original stable property including these pieces to Taylor.

I do not think the fact that during the currency of the lease of 1856 the owners of the stable lease had lost the right to recover these pieces from Mrs. Triscott and had thereby enabled her to add them to the holding as between herself and Lord Mount Edgcumbe would have at all prevented their claiming the possession of them again from Lord Mount Edgcumbe when he acquired them from Mrs. Triscott at the expiration of the lease of March, 1856. In fact Lord Mount Edgcumbe's right to the disputed pieces on the determination of the foundry lease would automatically vest in the owner of the stable lease. That being so, it does not seem to me that anything happened at the expiration or surrender of that term which rebuts the presumption that during the term these pieces were held under it. I think, therefore, that at this time Lord Mount Edgcumbe acquired the right to the possession, and his leases of 1894 and 1898 were good leases.

That being so, I hold first, that no right of entry accrued to Lord Mount Edgcumbe in 1856, and that on that view his right first accrued on the surrender of the stable lease in December, 1894; secondly, if I am wrong in that, and he did acquire a right of entry in 1856, so that the statute then began to run against him, the effect of its so running was to add the disputed pieces to the foundry lease so that as against Mrs. Triscott he acquired a new right on the determination of that lease in July, 1890, or shortly before that date when the third life dropped, and whichever of those views is correct the Statute of Limitations does not bar this action of the plaintiffs unless that third life dropped before the 18th of July, 1889.

It is not very satisfactory that I should have to give judgment in this case, which will probably go to the Court of Appeal and possibly to the House of Lords, without the date of the determination of the lease of March, 1856, having been proved, but I understand from counsel that although the fact is known there is some difficulty in putting before me an admission as to it on which I can act. Under the circumstances I can only deal with the case upon the footing that the statements in the lease of July, 1890, are correct, and that the former lease subsisted until immediately before the grant of the new lease.

I therefore give judgment for the plaintiffs for possession. Tehre is no claim for mesne profits. Of course costs will follow.

EGHAM RURAL DISTRICT COUNCIL v. GORDON. (a.)

Highway—Repairs—Excessive weight—Extraordinary traffic—"Person by whose order"—"By or in consequence of whose order"—Highway and Locomotives (Amendment) Act, 1878 (41 & 42 Vict. c. 77), s. 23—Locomotives Act, 1898 (61 & 62 Vict. c. 29), s. 12.

The defendant, being about to build a house in the plaintiffs' district, entered into a contract with a brick company for the delivery of a large number of bricks on the land where he intended building, but he gave no order as to the manner or time in which such bricks were to be delivered. The brick company, in the defendant's absence abroad, and without his knowledge, caused the bricks to be delivered by means of traction engines and trucks, the excessive weight of which caused damage to certain of the plaintiffs' roads, and they in consequence brought an action in the county court against the defendant to recover the amount of the expenses to which they had been put in repairing the roads The county court judge, under the circumstances, came to the conclusion that the defendant was not a person "by or in consequence of whose order" such excessive weight had been conducted over the plaintiffs' roads within the meaning of section 23 of the Highways and Locomotives (Amendment) Act, 1878, as amended by section 12, sub-section 1 (c), of the Locomotives Act, 1898, and that he was therefore not liable.

Held, that, under the circumstances of the case, and in view of the facts, the county court judge was not wrong in arriving at the conclusion he had come to.

This was an appeal by the plaintiffs from the decision of the county court judge of Surrey, sitting at Chertsey.

The plaintiffs' action was for damages in respect of extraordinary expenses incurred by them in repairing damage to certain roads caused by excessive weight passing along them or extraordinary traffic thereon.

It appeared that the defendant was building a house in the plaintiffs' district and that he gave an order to the Bracknell Brick and Tile Co. for 250,000 bricks to be delivered where the house was being built, but he did not give any instructions as to how they were to be sent.

The company ordered a contractor to deliver the bricks by means of a traction engine and trucks.

The defendant then went abroad, and during his absence, and without his knowledge, the bricks were sent as aforesaid, and in consequence the roads were damaged.

It was admitted at the trial that the damage was caused by the use of the trucks and traction engines, and that the damage would not have been done if the bricks had been delivered in carts in the usual way.

The county court judge found that the weight of the traffic was excessive, and that the damage was caused thereby, but that it did not take place in consequence of the defendant's orders, and he accordingly gave judgment for the defendant.

The plaintiffs now appealed.

The Highways and Locomotives (Amendment) Act, 1878, provides as follows:—

Section 23. "Where . . . it appears to the authority which is liable . . . to repair any highway . . . that . . . extraordinary expenses have been incurred by such authority in repairing such highway by reason of the damage caused by reason of excessive weight passing along the same or extraordinary traffic thereon, such authority may recover . . . from any person by whose order such weight or traffic has been conducted the amount of such expenses . . ."

The Locomotives Act, 1898, provides as follows:—

Section 12, sub-section 1. "Section 23 of the Highways and Locomotives (Amendment) Act, 1878 . . . shall be amended as follows . . . (c) There shall be substituted for the words 'by whose order' the words 'by or in consequence of whose order.'"

Macmorran, K.C. (C. F. Pritchard and McCalmont Hill with him), for the appellants.

The county court judge was wrong. The Act of 1898 was intended to meet the decision in Kent County Council v. Lord Gerard, 46 W. R. 111, [1897] A. C. 633, which was such a case as this, and to enable the local authority to sue the person for whose benefit whatever had taken place had been done. Although the defendant gave no directions as to the manner in which the bricks were to be conveyed to him, nevertheless he is liable if the bricks are brought in a lawful way and that lawful way causes damage to the roadway. It makes no difference whether the damage is caused by excessive weight or extraordinary traffic.

He referred to the following cases: Epsom Urban District Council v. London County Council. 49 W. R. 302. [1900] 2 Q. B. 751; and, Hill v. Thomas, 42 W. R. 85, [1893] 2 Q. B. 303.

Danckwerts, K.C. (Cunningham Glen with him), for the respondent.

The learned judge found that the damage was not caused in consequence of any order given by the defendant. That was a question of fact; and even if not so, the damage done was not the natural consequence of the defendant's order. The person for whose benefit the traction engine and trucks were used was the man who contracted to supply the bricks and not the defendant.

Macmorran, K.C., replied.

Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J.—This case is by no means free from difficulty. There is considerable weight in the argument on behalf of the plaintiffs that it was intended by the Act of 1898 to make the person responsible for whom the goods were being carried in the ultimate result. I think it is difficult to say, however, that the county court judge went wrong in law or applied a wrong principle of law. He held that these unusually large loads of bricks being brought over the roads by unusually heavy engines was not in consequence of the defendant's orders. That must amount to a finding that the mode in which the bricks were conveyed was in no way affected by any orders given by the defendant, and that it was not necessary that they should be brought in that way because of any direction he had given. That being so, it seems to me that the learned judge has negatived the allegation that the defendant was a pe

(a.) Reported by E. G. STILLWELL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

"by or in consequence of whose order" the traffic in question was conducted within the meaning of section 12, sub-section 1 (c) of the Act of 1898. If that is the true view, I do not think that the county court judge has misdirected himself on any question of law.

Upon the facts, I come to the conclusion that the learned judge was not wrong in holding that the damage to the road caused by this heavy traffic was not in consequence of any order given by the defendant, but was in consequence of the vendors choosing this particular method of fulfilling their contract with the defendant. I think, therefore, that the appeal must be dismissed.

DARLING, J.—I am of the same opinion. It seems to me that to accept the argument, with its logical consequence, put forward by the counsel for the plaintiffs would be to hold that whoever gives an order for goods is liable for any damage caused to the roads in the course of their delivery. I think that the words "in consequence of whose order" mean no more than "as a necessary consequence of whose order." Here the county court judge has found that the damage was not caused in consequence of the order given by the defendant, and I do not think we can say that in law he was not entitled to come to that conclusion.

CHANNELL, J.—I am also of the same opinion. The county court judge must be taken to have found that the damage was caused by the mode in which the vendors sent the bricks, and that this was not the necessary consequence of the defendant's order. It is really a question of fact, and the evidence in the case of a larger quantity of bricks having been delivered in the same road without any damage having resulted clearly justified the county court judge in arriving at the conclusion he did. I will only add that I do not think that the decision of Bigham, J., in Epsom Urban District Council v. London County Council, 49 W. R. 302, quite covers this case, though no doubt it goes a long way towards doing so.

KNIVETON v. NORTHERN EMPLOYERS' INDEMNITY. (a.)

Practice—Appeal—Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897 (60 & 61 Vict. c 57), s. 5—Appeal to High Court—County Courts Act, 1888 (51 & 52 Vict. c. 43), s. 120.

(a.) Reported by C. G. WILBRAHAM, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

An appeal from an order of a county court judge under section 5 of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, lies to the Divisional Court.

Appeal from the county court judge at Bolton ordering the defendant company to pay the sum of 14s. 9d. and arrears, the amount which the respondent had been awarded against the Darcy Lever Co., now in liquidation.

The accident took place on the 13th of December, 1900, and on the 8th of May, 1901, the order was made against the Darcy Lever Co. under the provisions of the Workmen's Compensation Act.

The appellant thereupon commenced this action under section 5 of the Workmen's Compensation Act, which provides that "where any employer becomes liable under this Act to pay compensation in respect of any accident, and is entitled to any sum from insurers in respect of any accident, then, in the event of the employer becoming bankrupt . . . or if the employer is a company of the company having commenced to be wound up such workman shall shall have a first charge upon the sum aforesaid for the sum so due. . . ."

The plaintiff contended that under the rules of the defendant association it was liable to the Darcy Lever Co. for the award in his favour.

The county court judge gave judgment for the plaintiff for the amount claimed.

The association appealed.

The respondents took the preliminary point that no appeal lay.

Chester Jones, for the respondents.—No appeal lies to this court, and the Act is a complete code of procedure, and the only appeal under the Act is an appeal to the Court of Appeal under Schedule II. (4). The decision of the county court judge is therefore final.

Haldane, K.C. (F. E. Smith with him), for the appellant.—An appeal lies to this court under section 120 of the County Courts Act. This is a distinct proceeding from the arbitration proceedings under Schedule II. (4), and the right of appeal given there has no application.

Lord ALVERSTONE, L.C.J.—The case in the Court of Appeal (Leech v. Life and Health Assurance Association, 49 W. R. 482, [1901] 1 K. B. 707) shows that there is no appeal to the Court of Appeal under section 5 of the Workmen's Compensation Act. Under section 5 there is a statutory subrogation of the workman to the rights of the employer, and it seems to me that, the matter being within the purview of the county court judge, the ordinary right of appeal under section 120 of the County Courts Act, 1888, applies.

DARLING and CHANNELL, JJ., concurred.

Cause of action—Contract, Inducing breach of—Justification — Bona fides. — The plaintiff was apprenticed by an indenture to W. & W. as a stonemason, and they employed him as a labourer. By one of the rules of the trade union of which the plaintiff and the defendants were members, and which rules W. & W. were parties to, it was provided "That boys entering the trade shall not work more than three months without being legally bound apprentice, and in no case to be more than sixteen years of age, except masons' sons and stepsons. Employers to have one apprentice to every four masons on an average." The plaintiff was twenty-five years of age when employed by W. & W. The defendants threatened to withdraw the men employed by W. & W., those men being members of the trade union, if the plaintiff was taught the art of a stonemason, and in consequence there was a breach of the contract entered into between the plaintiff and W. & W. The plaintiff brought an action against the defendants for procuring such breach.

Held, on appeal from the county court judge, who gave judgment for the defendants, that the plaintiff would have a cause of action against the defendants unless they showed they were justified in interfering with his contractual rights; such justification for interference with the plaintiff's rights must be an equal or superior right in themselves, and it would not be sufficient for them to show that they had acted on a wrong understanding of their rights or without malice, or bonâ fide, or in the best interests of themselves.—READ v. 5. Order of administration of assets—Insufficiency of personalty—Will—Secret trust of portion of residue—Specific gift debars the will.—A testatrix by her will gave her residuary estate to A., and by a memorandum not admissible to probate and subsequent to the date of will, but which was acknowledged by A., to constitute a trust binding on her, gave a specific portion of the residue in trust for certain other persons therein specified. The residue, after deducting therefrom the portion bound by the memorandum, proved insufficient to pay the debts and testamentary expenses of the testatrix.

Held, that the beneficiaries under the memorandum, though their title was dehors the will, were entitled to have the residuary personal estate not comprised in the memorandum exhausted to pay the debts and expenses before the property bound by the memorandum was resorted to, as such property had been specifically bequeathed

6. Power of appointment—Appointed fund—Valid receipt—Administrator with will annexed.—Where a married woman having a general power of appointment over a fund of personalty makes an appointment of the fund by will and appoints executors, and the said executors die without having proved the will,

Held, that the administratrix with the will annexed of the testatrix could give a valid receipt and discharge for all the settled funds.—PEACOCK, RE, KELCEY v. HARRISON, Ch D. Eady, J., 473; [1902] 1 Ch. 552; 71 L. J. Ch. 325; 86 L. T. 414.

7. Practice—Costs—Power of appointment—Successive appointments of specific sums—Appointment of residue—Costs of administering trust fund—Estate duty.—A husband and wife, in exercise of a joint power of appointment over a trust fund (subject to their respective life estates therein) amongst the children of the marriage, appointed three sums of £10,000 in trust for their three elder daughters, and appointed the residue, after satisfying the three previous appointments, in trust for their fourth daughter, but so that the appointment should not exceed £10,000. The fund was not sufficient to provide for the appointment of the full sum of £10,000 to the fourth daughter. Upon the distribution of the fund, Held, applying the rule laid down by Chitty, L.J., in In re Saunders, [1898] 1 Ch. 17, 23, that the general costs of administering the trust fund, including the costs of raising the estate duty payable on the respective deaths of the husband and wife and the costs of raising the appointed sums, ought to be borne rateably by the four appointed sums.—CHISHOLM, RE, GODDARD v. BRODIE, Ch.D. Kekewich, J.; [1902] 1 Ch. 457; 71 L. J. Ch. 289; 86 L. T. 183.

8. Settled land—Sale of timber—Conversion.—By an order of the court timber growing on land settled upon A. for life, with remainder in fee to B., was sold, and the proceeds invested in Consols in court.

Held, that as between the heir-at-law of B. and the personal representative of B. the proceeds of the sale were personalty, and an order was made (after the deaths of A. and B.) directing the transfer of the sum to the legal personal representative of B.—HARTLEY v. PENDARVES, *Ch.D. 9. Will—Beneficial and onerous property devised together—Aggregate gift—Onerous leaseholds settled to same uses as freeholds—Incidence of burden—Right to disclaim.—A testator devised freehold estate to his brother for life, with remainders over in strict settlement, and bequeathed his leaseholds to trustees to be settled to the same uses; his personal estate was insufficient to pay his legacies. Before his death he had contracted to purchase a freehold estate which proved to be worth less than the purchase-money remaining unpaid after his death. Among his leaseholds was a house which was sold after his death for a sum less than the sum charged on it by mortgage. On a summons to determine whether the excess of the purchase-money over the value of the one estate and the mortgage debt upon the other were chargeable upon the residue of the real estate or upon the personalty,

Held, that all the real estate and the leaseholds must be taken to be comprised in one gift, and the devisees could not reject the onerous part and accept the beneficial, and that both charges must therefore be paid out of the real estate.

ADULTERATION:—

1. Butter—Article not of the nature, substance, and quality demanded—Adding milk to—Sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 63), s. 6.—A provision merchant who sells to a purchaser, who demands butter, a compound consisting of butter made by the ordinary process, in which a large proportion of the water in the cream or milk is eliminated, to which was added milk from which no water was eliminated, in consequence of which the compound contains an excess of water, is guilty, under section 6 of the Sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1875, of selling to the prejudice of the purchaser an article of food not of the nature, substance, and quality demanded by the purchaser.—PEARKS v. KNIGHT; PEARKS v. VAN TROMP, K.B.D., 104; [1901] 2 K B. 825; 70 L. J. K. B. 1002; 85 L. T. 379.

2. Butter—Process of blending milk with butter—Increased percentage of water—Sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 63), s. 6.—A purchaser, acting on behalf of an inspector under the Sale of Food and Drugs Act, asked for and purchased from the appellants, grocers, half a pound of one shilling butter, which on analysis was proved to contain 7·8 per cent. more water than the limit of 16 per cent. natural to butter. This excess of water was caused by a process adopted by the appellants of blending milk with butter. On the wall behind the butter counter in the appellants' shop there was a notice in large letters that the butter sold by them was "choicest butter blended with pure English full cream milk by new and improved machinery, whereby it retains about 20 to 24 per cent. of moisture." This notice was visible to anyone going into the shop, though the purchaser in this case did not observe it, nor was his attention called to it.

Held, that, as an ordinary purchaser entering the shop would see, and must be taken to have seen, the notice, the sale took place upon the notice, and was a sale of blended butter and not ordinary butter, and that, therefore, the sale could not be considered a sale to the prejudice of the purchaser within the meaning of section 6 of the Sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1875, and that, therefore, no offence had been committed under that section.—PEARKS v. HOUGHTON, K.B.D., 605; [1902] 1 K. B. 889; 71 L. J. K. B. 385; 86 L. T. 325.

3. Company, sale by—"Person"—Liability—"To the prejudice of the purchaser"—Knowledge of purchaser—Sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 63), s. 6—Interpretation Act, 1889 (52 & 53 Vict. c. 63), s. 2, sub-section 1.—The Sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1875, s. 6, enacts that no person shall sell to the prejudice of the purchaser any article of food or any drug which is not of the nature, substance, and quality of the article demanded by such purchaser, under a penalty not exceeding £20.

Held, that a joint stock company incorporated under the Companies Acts can be convicted of an offence under section 6:

Held, also, that a sale may be to the prejudice of the purchaser within section 6, although the purchaser had special knowledge, not derived from information given by the seller, that the article sold was not of the nature, substance, and quality demanded by him. The test is whether the sale would have been to the prejudice of a purchaser who had not that special knowledge.—PEARKS, GUNSTON, & TEE (LIMITED) v. WARD; HENNEN v. SOUTHERN COUNTIES DAIRIES CO. (LIMITED), K.B.D.; [1902] 2 K. B. 1; 71 L. J. K. B. 656.

4. Food—Giving of false warranty—Limit of time for laying information—Sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 63), s. 20—Sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1899 (62 & 63 Vict. c. 51), ss. 19, 20, sub-section 6—Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1848 (11 & 12 Vict. c. 43), s. 11.—An information under the Sale of Food and Drugs Acts in respect of a false warranty must be laid within six months of the date on which the warranty was given.—WHITAKER v. POMFRET BROTHERS, K.B.D., 393; [1902] 1 K. B. 661; 71 L. J. K. B. 353; 86 L. T. 420.

5. Food—Margarine—Excess of water—Sale not of nature, substance, and quality demanded—Sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 63), s. 6.—Margarine having been purchased and analyzed, evidence was given that it contained 21 per cent. of water, which was at least 5 per cent. in excess of water that margarine should contain.

Held, that the vendor was rightly convicted of selling to the prejudice of the purchaser margarine not of the nature, substance, and quality demanded, contrary to the Sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1875, s. 6.—BURTON v. MATTINSON, K.B.D.; 86 L. T. 770.

6. Food—Sale "to prejudice of purchaser"—No evidence of inferiority of article sold—Addition of glucose to marmalade.—To a person who asked for a pot of marmalade a grocer sold a pot of marmalade which was found to contain 13 per cent. of starch glucose. The glucose consisted of sugar, a gummy substance which had no sweetening property, and water. There was no legal standard for the making of marmalade, and manufacturers used various recipes, and for many years glucose had been used by many, though not by all, manufacturers in the making of it. The glucose to the extent used was not injurious to health, and it prevented the marmalade from crystallizing and had a tendency to prevent mildewing and fermenting.

Held, that there was no evidence that the article supplied was inferior to the article demanded or was adulterated, and no evidence, therefore, that the sale was a sale to the prejudice of the purchaser within the meaning of section 6 of the Sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1875.—SMITH v. WISDEN, K.B.D.; 85 L. T. 760.

7. Food—Justices—Service of summons—Defendant a limited company—Sale of Food and Drugs Act—Companies Act, 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 57), s. 62.—A service of a summons under the Food and Drugs Acts on a limited company is only valid if served in the manner prescribed under section 62 of the Companies Act.—Pearks v. Richardson, K.B.D., 286; [1902] 1 K. B. 91; 71 L. J. K. B. 18; 85 L. T. 616.

8. Milk—Defence—Written warranty—Application of warranty to future deliveries of milk—Evidence—Sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 63), s. 25.—In a prosecution under the Sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1875, for adulterating milk, where the defendant relies on section 25 as a defence, it is sufficient if, in order to prove that he bought the milk in question with a written warranty, he prove that he had contracted with dairymen to supply him with milk daily; that they gave him a written warranty with respect to all milk which they should so supply, and that the milk in question was sold and supplied to him under that contract and warranty. He need not prove a specific written warranty with respect to each delivery; nor need there be evidence in writing to connect the milk in question with the warranty on which he relies.

9. Milk—Sale of article not of nature, substance, and quality of article demanded—Milk as taken from cow deficient in fat—Sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 63), s. 6.—A purchaser demanded to be supplied with new milk, and was given an article which came direct from the cow and which had not been tampered with or adulterated in any way, but which, on analysis, was found to be deficient in milk fat. This deficiency was caused by the abnormal method employed in milking the cows—viz., an interval of sixteen hours between the evening milking and the morning milking, at which the milk in question was drawn.

Held, by Lord Alverstone, L.C.J., and Channell, J. (Darling, J., dissenting), that there was sufficient evidence on which the justices might find that the seller had committed the offence under section 6 of the Sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1875, of selling to the prejudice of the purchaser an article not of the nature, substance, and quality of the article demanded.—SMITHIES v. BRIDGE, K.B D., 686; [1902] 2 K. 10. Milk—Successive warranties—Jurisdiction of magistrates—Sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 63), ss. 25, 27—Sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1899, s. 20, sub-section 5, 6.—The magistrates, in cases where the sale and delivery has taken place outside the jurisdiction of the court, have no jurisdiction to deal with a case of giving a false warranty, unless the warranty was given to the person from whom it was purchased for analysis.—MANNERS v. TYLER, K.B.D., 604; [1902] 1 K. ADVOWSON:—

Sale of glebe—Private Act (6 & 7 Vict. c. xvi.)—Patron—Infant—Consent to sale—Trustees of settlement—Guardian.—By a private Act glebe land was vested in trustees, with power to sell with the consent of the patron, "who shall be seised of the advowson thereof in possession, whether for an estate of inheritance or any less estate, and by the guardians of any such patron or patrons, being an infant or infants."

The patron was an infant whose estates had been settled by an indenture which provided (inter alia) that, during the minority of the patron, the trustees should have power to present to any vacant benefice.

Held, that the trustees were not entitled to the advowson "for any estate of inheritance or any less estate" within the meaning of the Act; and that the guardian of the infant was the proper person to give the consent to the sale.—LEIGH v. LEIGH, Ch.D. Eady, J., 380; [1902] 1 Ch. 400; 71 L. J. Ch. 195; 86 L. T. 219.

ANIMAL:—

Horse—Working in an unfit state—Guilty knowledge—Prevention of Cruelty to Animals Act, 1849 (12 & 13 Vict. c. 92), s. 2.—The appellant, who was charged with causing two horses to be worked in an unfit state, carried on business in London, and the two horses in question were under the charge of one L. at a farm at C., where the appellant resided. He was practically always away, and did not see the horses above once a fortnight, they being under the entire management of L. There was some evidence that the appellant knew that the horses had been out of condition at some time, but no evidence was given as to the date when that was, or how long it was before the alleged improper working. There was no evidence that the appellant had interfered with L., had given any order for the horses to be worked, or knew of their condition on the day in question. On the 2nd of May, 1901, the horses were being worked in an unfit state. The justices convicted the appellant.

Held (allowing the appeal), that there was a failure on the part of the prosecution to give any evidence of guilty knowledge with regard to the offence in question.—GREENWOOD v. BACKHOUSE, K.B.D.; 86 L. T. 566.

ARBITRATION:—

1. Building contract—Submission of disputes to architect—Litigation between builder and architect—Action of fraud—Application to revoke submission.—Where, by the terms of a building contract, all questions are submitted to the arbitration of an architect appointed by the building owners, the mere fact that the builders, or those claiming through them, bring an action against the architect charging him with fraud in relation to the contract does not entitle them to revoke the submission.—BELCHER v. ROEDEAN SCHOOL SITE AND BUILDINGS (LIMITED), C.A.; 85 L. T. 468.

2. Stay of proceedings—Agreement to refer—Legal proceedings in respect of matter agreed to be referred—Application for stay—Step in proceedings—Summons for directions—Arbitration Act, 1889 (52 & 53 Vict. c. 49), s. 4—R. S. C., ord. 30, rr. 1, 2.—An action was brought for breach of a written contract which contained an agreement to refer matters in dispute between the parties. The defendant attended at chambers on the hearing of a summons for directions taken out by the plaintiffs, on which an order was made that the plaintiffs and defendant should respectively make discovery of documents. The defendant subsequently applied under section 4 of the Arbitration Act, 1889, for a stay of proceedings, Held, that the defendant had taken a step in the proceedings, and was, therefore, not entitled to a stay.—COUNTY THEATRES AND HOTELS (LIMITED) v. KNOWLES, C.A.; [1902] 1 K. B. 480; 71 L. J. K. B. 351; 86 L. T. 132.

ASSIGNMENT:—

1. Debt—Same debt assigned to different persons—Priority—Notice to debtor—Debt due to firm—Assignment by one partner by deed—Validity.—A debt due to a firm was assigned by one partner to the defendants by writing, and was subsequently assigned by the other partner to the plaintiff by deed. The plaintiff gave notice to the debtor before the defendants did so.

Held, that there was a valid equitable assignment of the debt to the plaintiff, and that, having first given notice to the debtor, he was entitled to the debt in priority to the defendants.—MARCHANT v. MORTON, DOWN, & Co., K.B.D.; [1901] 2 K. B. 829; 70 L. J. K. B. 820; 85 L. T. 169.

2. Equitable assignment—Order given by debtor to his solicitors to collect his debt and pay third party—Subsequent deed of assignment for creditors.—F., being the debtor of C., B. & Co., and the creditor of W. & Sons, instructed his solicitors, who were suing W. & Sons, to hold the proceeds at the disposal of C., B. & Co. Subsequently F. called his creditors together, and a deed of assignment was executed by C., B. & Co. with the other creditors. The solicitors received part of the money due from W. & Sons before the execution of the deed by C., B. & Co., and the remainder afterwards. The deed contained a clause that it was not to prejudice the rights of creditors in respect of securities held against any person but the debtor.

Held, that this was a good equitable assignment of the whole of the proceeds of the debt of W. & Sons, and that C., B. & Co. were entitled as against the trustee of the deed.—PALMER v. CULVERWELL, K.B.D.; 85 L. T. 758.

3. Assignment of debt—Absolute assignment—Security for moneys due or to become due on a banking account—Right of assignor to sue—Judicature Act, 1873 (36 & 37 Vict. c. 66), s. 25, sub-section 6.—The plaintiff, a builder, entered into a contract with the defendants to execute certain building work at their hotel. Subsequently the plaintiff, by an instrument in writing, assigned to his bankers, by way of continuing security for all moneys due or to become due to them from him, all moneys due or to become due to him from the defendants under the contract. Notice of this assignment was given to the defendants, and at the same time a letter was written to them by the plaintiff authorizing and requesting them to pay the moneys to the bankers, whose receipt should be their sufficient discharge. In an action by the plaintiff to recover the moneys due under the contract,

Held, that this was an absolute assignment not purporting to be by way of charge only, within the meaning of section 25, sub-section 6, of the Judicature Act, 1873, and that the plaintiff was not entitled to sue.—HUGHES v. PUMP HOUSE HOTEL Co., C.A.. 660; [1902] 2 K. ATTACHMENT:—

1. Foreign order—Enrolment—Disobedience—Service in England—Jurisdiction.—Motion for leave to issue a writ of attachment. An order was made by one of the Land Judges of the Chancery Division of the High Court of Ireland upon the respondent A. H. S to lodge in the court on oath all document in his custody, power, or procurement relating to certain property in Ireland ordered to be sold (or account for the same on oath) within ten days after service of the said order upon him. By an order made on the 26th of March 1901, the Irish order was ordered to be enrolled in the Chancery Division of the High Court of Justice in England. On the 11th of April, 1901, a copy of the order of the 26th of March, 1901 was personally served on A. H. S. in London.

Held, that as the order to lodge the deeds in court had not been served on A. H. S. in Ireland, and no leave had been obtained to serve that order on A. H. S. out of the jurisdiction, there had been no disobedience, and the motion for leave to issue a writ attachment must be refused.—SYNGE, RE, C.A.; 85 L. T. 736.

2. Non-payment of rates—Committal—Bankruptcy of debtor—Legal process—Jurisdiction—Debtors Act, 1869 (32 & 33 Vict. c. 62), s. 4—Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52), s. 10 (2).—Committal for non-payment of rates is punitive, and is not "a legal process against the property or person of the debtor" within section 10 (2) of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883. The court has, therefore, no jurisdiction to order the release of the debtor under that sub-section upon proof of the presentation of a bankruptcy petition.—EDGCOMBE, RE, C.A., 678.

3. Passing off—Action for—Default of pleading—Injunction—Alleged breach—Estoppel.—The plaintiff brought an action against the defendants for an injunction to restrain them from passing off goods alleged to be a colourable imitation of those of the plaintiff's manufacture. The defendants made default in pleading, and the injunction was granted in due course. Later it appeared that a similar article to that complained of was being put upon the market by N., for whom the defendants were acting as agents for sale. On a motion for attachment of the defendants for breach of the injunction no direct evidence was forthcoming, and the case was rested on admissions by the defendants (which the court held to be insufficient) and on the fact that the defendants, having allowed judgment to go against them by default, were estopped from saying that the goods complained of were not an imitation of those of the plaintiff's manufacture.

Held, that in these circumstances an attachment could not issue.—RIPLEY v. ARTHUR, Ch.D. Farwell, J.; 86 L. T. 495, 735.

4. Release from custody—Judicial separation—Order to pay or secure wife's costs—Wife's costs of proceedings for attachment—Where a husband who has been attached and imprisoned for contempt of court in failing to obey an order of the court to pay or secure a sum of money for his wife's costs in a suit brought by her for judicial separation, has afterwards obeyed the order, he is entitled to be released from custody. The court will order him to pay all his wife's costs incurred with respect to the motions for attachment and release, but will not make the payment of such costs a condition precedent to his release.

BAILMENT:—

Loss of chattel owing to negligence of stranger—Action by bailee—Bailee not liable to bailor.—The bailee of a chattel, who is under no liability in respect thereof to the bailor, can maintain an action against a stranger by whose negligence the chattel has been lost or injured, and he is entitled to recover the full value of the chattel in the one case, or the whole amount of the damage in the other.

The bailee, having recovered the full amount of the damages, must account to the bailor for his proportion thereof; and the wrongdoer, having paid those damages to the bailee, has an answer to any action by the bailor.

BANKER:

1. Bill of exchange—Cheque—Crossed cheque—Receipt of payment for customer—Agent for collection—Crediting customer in account—Crossing of cheque by banker—Draft by branch bank on head office—Cheque drawn on other branch of collecting bank—Conversion—Bills of Exchange Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 61), ss. 60, 82.—In an action for conversion it appeared that the plaintiff's clerk stole a number of drafts payable to the plaintiff's order, and, after putting on them forged endorsements of the plaintiff's signature, paid them into a branch bank of the defendants, where he had no account. The majority of the drafts were cheques drawn on other banks, and were crossed before they were received by the defendants. Some of them were cheques drawn on other banks, but were not crossed when received by the defendants. Others were drafts signed by the manager of another branch of the defendants' bank and addressed to the defendants' head office. Others were cheques drawn on other branches of the defendants' bank. The defendants crossed all the drafts, whether they were crossed before or not, and placed the amounts at once to the clerk's credit. In nearly every case the clerk added his own endorsement.

Held, that the defendants were liable in respect of all the cheques drawn on other banks, not being protected by section 82 of the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882; for, by giving credit to the clerk at once, they acted not as agents for collection for a customer, but as holders of the cheques for value.

Held, also, that the defendants could not, by crossing the cheques which were uncrossed when they received them, acquire for them the protection of section 82.

Held, also, that the defendants were liable in respect of the drafts addressed by the branch manager to the head office; for such drafts were not cheques at all, and on that ground the defendants were not protected by section 82.

Held, also, that the defendants were not liable in respect of cheques drawn on other branches, being protected by section 60.—GORDON v. LONDON CITY AND MIDLAND BANK, C.A., 276; [1902] 1 K. B. 242; 71 L. J. K B. 215; 86 L. T. 98.

2. Bill of Exchange — Crossed cheque — "Not negotiable"—Receipt of payment for customer—Bills of Exchange Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 61), ss 81 and 82.—A rate collector who is well known and accustomed to get cheques cashed at a bank, but having no account of his own there, is not a "customer" within the meaning of the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882, s. 82. Should a bank cash for such a person a cheque drawn upon another bank in favour of such a person as payee, but marked "not negotiable," and afterwards receive payment of the amount from the bank on which the cheque is drawn; if the cheque had been obtained by such payee by false pretences, the the first-mentioned bank is not protected from liability to the drawer by the above section.

BANKRUPTCY:

1. Act of bankruptcy—Deed of assignment—Assent of petitioning creditor—Delay in presenting petition.—A creditor who, knowing that the debtor has executed a deed of assignment, unduly delays the presentation of a petition will be taken to have assented to the deed.

The mere sending of a representative to a meeting of creditors who takes no part in the proceedings, does not bind the creditor who sends him to any course that may be agreed upon at such meeting.—CARR, RE, JACOBS, EX PARTE, Bkcy., 336; 85 L. T 552.

2. Act of bankruptcy—Deed of assignment for the benefit of creditors—Notice—Delay in presentation of petition—Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict c. 52), s. 4 (1) (a)—Where a creditor, who is aware that the debtor has executed a deed of assignment for the benefit of creditors, does not assent to the deed, and expressly reserves his right to take bankruptcy proceedings, he is entitled to succeed on a petition founded on the deed, even though there be some delay in presenting the petition.

In April, 1900, he asked D. for a loan of £1,000, and it was eventually arranged that D. should purchase part of the plant of his business for £1,000, and W. should re-purchase it under a hire-purchase agreement. In the following July a similar transaction took place under which W. received £2,000. The hire-purchase agreements contained a licence to seize and sell. On the 6th of February, 1901, W. assigned to the defendant company all his trade assets, including the chattels comprised in the two hire-purchase agreements, but retained book debts of the nominal value of £1,760, which realized £700. The consideration for the assignment was £3,700 in second debentures and £100 in cash. D. took first debentures of the nominal value of £3,000. At the date of the assignment to the company W. owed £4,000, excluding his debt to D. The company went into liquidation, and its assets were insufficient to satisfy the first debentures.

Held, (1) that the assignment to the company was void as an act of bankruptcy; (2) that the transactions resulting in the hire-purchase agreements were in reality loans, and were void under the Bills of Sale Acts owing to the power to seize and sell, and that the chattels comprised therein had not passed to D. by a title antecedent to the sale to the company.—WHEATLEY'S TRUSTEE v. WHEATLEY, Bkcy.; 85 L. 4. Action for trespass—Claim for personal damage—Bankruptcy of plaintiff—Cause of action remaining in plaintiff.—An action was brought for trespass and conversion of goods, and damages were claimed for the personal inconvenience thereby occasioned to the plaintiff. The plaintiff subsequently became bankrupt.

Held, that, the damage to the goods being admitted to be nominal, the essential cause of action was the personal injury to the plaintiff, and that this cause of action did not pass to the trustee in bankruptcy, but remained in the plaintiff, who was, therefore, entitled to prosecute his action.

1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52), ss. 43, 44.—The plaintiffs granted a lease to B. B. made an assignment of all her property, including the lease, to the defendant for the benefit of her creditors. A petition in bankruptcy was presented against B., alleging the assignment as the act of bankruptcy. The plaintiffs brought an action against the defendant for rent which accrued due after the assignment. After the commencement of the action, and before the trial, B. was adjudicated bankrupt and the trustee in bankruptcy disclaimed the lease.

Held, that the plaintiffs were entitled to recover the rent from the defendant.—STEIN v. POPE, C.A., 374; [1902] 1 K. B. 595; 71 L. J. K. B. 322; 86 L. T. 283.

6. Bankruptcy notice—Judgment creditor—Seizure by sheriff under fi. fa.—Withdrawal without return to writ—Right to issue notice—Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52), s. 4 (1) (g).—A judgment creditor issued a writ of fi. fa. against the judgment debtor's goods, but on learning that all the goods at the debtor's residence were claimed by third parties, directed the sheriff to withdraw, which the sheriff did without making any return to the writ. The judgment creditor then issued a bankruptcy notice for the amount of the debt against the judgment debtor

Held, on the evidence, that the sheriff was never in possession of any goods of the judgment debtor, and that the judgment creditor accordingly had a right to issue the bankruptcy notice, since there was no stay, express or implied, nor had the sheriff realized anything by the seizure or sale of the goods of the debtor for which he was bound to account or make a deduction from the judgment debt.—DEBTOR, A, RE, JUDGMENT CREDITOR, EX PARTE, C.A., 609; [1902] 2 Q. They refused to lend on a fourth mortgage of the hotel, and Mellor refused to give them a bill of sale. It was therefore arranged that the defendants should buy the furniture in the hotel from the vendor for £2 000 instead of Mellor and should let the furniture to Mellor under a hiring and purchase agreement. Mellor subsequently became bankrupt, and the furniture was claimed by the trustee in the bankruptcy.

Held, that the defendants had purchased the furniture as trustees for Mellor, who was the real owner, and that they had no title to the goods except under the hiring and purchase agreement, which was void for want of registration as a bill of sale.

9. Interpleader—Property divisible among creditors—Property held on trust—Assignee for benefit of creditors—Right of indemnity over assets—Lien passing to trustee in bankruptcy—Execution creditor—Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52), s. 44.—The assignee of a business under a deed of assignment for the benefit of creditors who incurs debts in carrying on the business has a right of indemnity or lien over the assets of the business which on his bankruptcy passes to his trustee.

The assignee of a business under such a deed incurred a debt in carrying it on for which judgment was signed against him, and the judgment creditor seized some of the assets of the business in execution. The assignee then became bankrupt.

Held, that, although the assets of the business were properly held by the assignee on trust, and so, by virtue of section 44 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, were not divisible among his creditors, yet the trustee in bankruptcy had such an interest in them as to entitle him to succeed in an interpleader issue against the execution creditor.

This claim did not arise out of the bankruptcy.

Held, that the county court had no jurisdiction. The jurisdiction is the same in summary as in ordinary bankruptcies.—BILLING, RE, OFFICIAL RECEIVER, EX PARTE, Bkcy.; 86 L. T. 689.

14. Private examination of witness in foreign country—Jurisdiction—Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52), ss. 27, 105, 118.—The court has no power under section 27 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, to make an order for the private examination of witnesses in a foreign country.—DRUCKER, RE, (No. 2), Bkcy., 592; [1902] 2 K B. 210; 71 L. 15. Proof of debts—Breach of contract—Damages in tort—Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52),

s. 37.—S. stored goods with H. under a verbal contract, in breach of which H. sold the goods. S. brought an action against H., and in the statement of claim set out the contract and its breach, but made no claim for damages for breach of contract, but only for detinue and conversion. Before judgment a receiving order was made against H., of which S. had notice.

Held, by Wright, J., that S., having elected to sue in tort rather than contract, must abide by the result, and that the trustee in H.'s bankruptcy had rightly rejected S.'s proof founded on that judgment debt and costs.

Held, by Court of Appeal, that on S. undertaking to abandon the judgment, and stay all further proceedings under it, she should be permitted to carry in a proof in the bankruptcy for damages for breach of contract.—HOPKINS, RE, DE STEDINGK, EX PARTE, C.A., 86 L. T. 676.

16. Proof of debts—Legacy—Direction giving legatee power to retain debt due to testator in or towards satisfaction of legacy—Specific legacy—Abatement.—The testator bequeathed to his son £10,000, and directed that as regards any money due to him at his decease from that legatee the same should (but not to an amount exceeding £10,000) be set off and retained in or towards satisfaction of the legacy. The legatee was indebted to the testator's estate, and the executors obtained judgment against him for £26,398 12s. 6d., after giving credit for the amount of the legacy. The legatee became bankrupt, and the testator's estate proved insufficient to pay the legacies in full. The executors proved in the bankruptcy for £5,356 1s. 2d., the difference between the amount of the legacy of £10,000, with which the bankrupt had been credited, and £4,643 18s. 10d., the proportion due on abatement.

Held, that the legacy was not specific, and was subject to abatement, and that the proof must be admitted.—RICHARDSON, IN RE, THOMPSON, EX PARTE, Bkcy.; 86 L. T. 25.

17. Property of bankrupt—Assignment of chose in action—Notice of assignment—Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52), s. 44.—Prior to the bankruptcy the bankrupt had borrowed money from his wife, and deposited a life policy with her as security for the loan.

The trustee gave notice of the bankruptcy to the insurance company before the wife gave notice of her claim.

Held, that the fact of the trustee having been the first to give notice to the insurance company did not affect her title as an incumbrancer for value prior to the bankruptcy.—WALLIS, RE, TRUSTEE, THE, EX PARTE, Bkcy., 430; [1902] 1 K. B. 719; 71 L. J. K. B. 465; 86 L. T. 237.

18. Property of bankrupt—Money paid to settle bankruptcy petition—Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52), s. 44.—The debtor gave his solicitors a charge to secure inter alia a sum to be paid by them in settlement of a bankruptcy petition presented by the respondents. The solicitors paid that sum to the respondents, who withdrew their petition. The debtor was subsequently made bankrupt upon a petition presented within three months of the act of bankruptcy, of which the respondents had notice.

Held, that the trustee in the bankruptcy was not entitled to recover from the respondents the sum paid to them in settlement of their petition, as it never was the debtor's money.

19. Property of bankrupt—Relation back of trustee's title—Money paid for bets—Protected transaction—Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52), s. 49—Money paid away by a debtor after an act of bankruptcy committed within three months before the presentation of a bankruptcy petition against him, upon which he is adjudicated bankrupt, can be recovered by his trustee in bankruptcy in like manner as goods transferred by him or their proceeds can be recovered.

A debtor, after he had committed an act of bankruptcy, paid to the defendant a sum of money in respect of a bet which he had lost to the defendant, and he also deposited with the defendant a sum of money as security for bets which he had made with him. The defendant won the bets and retained the money. Subsequently a receiving order was made against the debtor, founded on the act of bankruptcy, and he was adjudicated bankrupt.

Held, that the transactions were not protected by section 49 (c) (d) of the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, as the money was paid without valuable consideration, and that the trustee was entitled to recover the money.—WARD v. FRY, C.A., 72; 85 L. T. 394.

20. Property of bankrupt—Reputed ownership—Building agreement—Mortgage—Power of mortgagee to seize if builder "become bankrupt"—Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52), s. 44.—A builder entered into a building agreement which provided that all the materials and plant brought upon the ground should "be deemed to be annexed to the freehold," and mortgaged all his interest under the agreement by a deed providing (inter alia) that if the builder should "become bankrupt" the mortgagee might take possession and complete the buildings. The mortgagee took possession on the day a receiving order was made against the builder on which he was subsequently adjudicated bankrupt.

Held, that the mortgagee was not entitled to seize because "become bankrupt" meant "be adjudicated a bankrupt."

Held, also, that the plant and materials on the land at the date of the commencement of the bankruptcy were in the order and disposition of the bankrupt, with the consent of the freeholder, who was the true owner, and passed to the trustee in the bankruptcy.

22. Property of bankrupt—Verbal contract with solicitor to act in the bankruptcy—Payment of lump sum—Repayment.—A solicitor received from a client a lump sum under a verbal contract to act for him in his bankruptcy proceedings.

Held, that the amount so paid must be repaid to the trustee, less costs incurred to the date of the receiving order.—MANDER, RE, THE OFFICIAL RECEIVER, EX PARTE, Bkcy.; 86 L. T. 234.

23. Report of official receiver—Offence under Debtors Act—Consideration by the court—Order to prosecute—Debtors Act, 1869 (32 & 33 Vict. c. 62), s. 16 —Bankruptcy Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 52) s. 164.—Where an official receiver reports that a bankrupt has been guilty of offences under the Debtors Act, it is the duty of the court to consider the report and to decide whether the bankrupt should be prosecuted; but there is no duty imposed on the court to decide at any particular time as to a prosecution.—DUNN, RE, OFFICIAL RECEIVER, EX PARTE, C.A., 183; [1902] 1 K. 25. Scheme of arrangement—Declaration of trust—Withdrawal of proofs—Debts provable—Conduct of debtor—Bankruptcy Act, 1890 (53 & 54 Vict c. 71), s. 3, sub-section 9.—"Debts provable" under the Bankruptcy Act, 1890, s. 3 (9), means debts provable at the time when the scheme of arrangement comes before the court for approval, and not when the receiving order is made.

Rash and hazardous speculation on the part of the debtor is not of itself necessarily a ground for refusing to sanction a scheme of arrangement.

Misconduct of a debtor does not make it against public policy to sanction a scheme unless the misconduct is of a gross character.—E. A. B., RE, C.A., 229; [1902] 1 K. B. 457; 71 L. J. K. B. 356; 85 L. T. 773.

Second marriage performed abroad — Offences against the Person Act, 1861 (24 & 25 Vict. c. 100), s. 57.—By the Offences against the Person Act, 1861, section 57, "Whosoever being married shall marry any other person during the life of the former husband or wife, whether the second marriage shall have taken place in England or Ireland, or elsewhere, shall be guilty of felony."

Held, that the section extends to a case where the second marriage is celebrated beyond the King's dominions.—TRIAL OF EARL RUSSELL, H.L.; [1901] A. C. 446; 70 L. J. K. B. 998; 85 L. T. 253.

BILL OF EXCHANGE:—

1. Agreement for agent to provide drawer for particular purpose—Insertion of name for another purpose—Liability of third person who takes in good faith. — In pursuance of an agreement made between the plaintiffs and J. R. for accommodation in relation to acceptances, the plaintiffs handed J. R. certain bills which they had accepted, in which the dates and drawers' names were left blank, which under the agreement were to be provided by J. R. The bills were to be used by J. R. to recoup himself for advances to the plaintiffs, and for the purpose of raising money for the plaintiffs. J. R. used the bills for his own purposes, and having filled in the dates, handed them to the defendant L. who, acting in good faith, inserted drawers' names. In an action against L. for conversion, Held, that although L. took the bills in good faith, he was liable, as he took bills with only an acceptor's name but no drawer's name, and so ran the risk that J. R. had no authority, or only a limited authority, to allow a drawer's name to be put in the instrument; that here J. R. had no authority to insert a drawer's name under the circumstances, as the only authority he had to insert a name was that of a drawer who would take the bill for the plaintiff's benefit; and that the insertion of the words in the agreement, "drawers to be provided by the said J. R.," did not extend the limited authority actually given.—WATKINS v. LAMB, K.B.D.; 85 L. T. 483.

2. Promissory note—Fraud of third party—Holder in due course—"Negotiated"—Bills of Exchange Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 61), ss. 20, 29.—The defendant applied to A for a loan of £15. At A.'s request the defendant, on promise of the loan, signed a blank paper bearing a 9d. stamp, and gave A. authority to fill it up as a promissory note for £15 payable to A. Subsequently A. applied to the plaintiff for a loan of £25, and offered in exchange to give the plaintiff the defendant's promissory note for £30. This was agreed to, and A. filled up the signed and stamped paper as a promissory note for £30 payable to the plaintiff, who received it in ignorance of the true facts, giving in exchange his cheque for £25 payable to the order of the defendant. A. having forged the defendant's signature to the plaintiff's cheque obtained payment for the same.

Held, that, although a payee might be a "holder in due course" within section 29 of the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882, yet the delivery here to the plaintiff did not "negotiate" the note within the proviso to section 20 of that Act, and therefore, as the note was not filled up by A. strictly in accordance with the authority given him by the defendant, the plaintiff could not recover on the note.

3. Solicitor—Lien for costs—Solicitor instructed to recover bill—Bill handed to solicitor—Defect in title of client—Overdue accommodation bill—Right of solicitor to sue on the bill for unpaid costs.—The acceptors of a bill drawn for their accommodation, and payable to the order of the drawer handed the bill to the drawer to get it discounted, and the drawer having indorsed it in blank handed it to one L. to get it discounted. L. did not get it discounted, and refused to return it. The drawer then instructed solicitors to bring an action against L. for the recovery of the bill, which they did. They succeeded in the action, and L. in court handed over the bill to the solicitors as solicitors for the then plaintiff (the drawer). The solicitors then told the drawer (their client) and the acceptors that they would hold the bill by way of lien until their costs in the action were paid, and the drawer and acceptors did not dissent, but in fact assented. At the time the bill was handed to the solicitors in court it was to their knowledge an overdue accommodation bill, but at the time they brought the action for its recovery it was not due, and they did not know it was an accommodation bill. In an action by the solicitors on the bill against the drawer and the acceptors, in respect of the balance of their costs—there being no question as to the liability of the drawer on his retainer,

Held, that the solicitors, when their claim to hold the bill by way of lien for their costs was assented to by the parties to the bill, became "holders" of the bill within the meaning of section 27, sub-section 3, of the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882, and that, being holders having a lien on the bill, they were "holders for value to the extent of the sum for which they had a lien"—namely, to the extent of their unpaid costs, and were entitled to recover the balance of their costs against the acceptors, although when the bill was handed to them they knew that it was overdue and was an accommodation bill.—REDFERN v. ROSENTHAL, K.B.D.; 85 L. BOND:—

Bearer bonds—Negotiability by custom—Holders for value—Liability of Stockbroker for conversion.—Certain "bearer bonds," consisting partly of bonds of foreign corporations and partly of bonds of an English company, were stolen from the plaintiff by his clerk, who employed M., a provincial stockbroker, to sell them. M. instructed the defendants, who were London stockbrokers, to sell the bonds on the London Stock Exchange. The defendants, bonâ fide and without notice of any defect in the vendor's title, effected the sale and remitted the proceeds to M. The plaintiff sued the defendants for conversion of the bonds. Evidence was given of a custom to treat the bonds in question as negotiable in the same way as the bonds of foreign governments.

Held, that the bonds were negotiable instruments, that the defendants were holders of them for value, and therefore that the action was not maintainable.

BYE-LAW.—See Canada, Law of, 2; Local Government, 1-4.

CANADA, LAW of:—

1. Local legislature—Province—Licensing law—Conflict of laws.—A provincial legislature in Canada has jurisdiction to restrict the sale of intoxicating liquors within the province so long as its legislation does not conflict with any legislative provision which may be competently made by the Parliament of Canada and in force within the province.

Attorney-General for Ontario v. Attorney-General for the Dominion, [1896] A. C. 348, 44 W. R. Dig. 24, followed.—ATTORNEY-GENERAL FOR MANITOBA v. MANITOBA LICENCE-HOLDERS' ASSOCIATION, P.C., 431; [1902] A. C. 73; 71 L. J. P. C. 78; 85 L. T. 591.

2. Powers of provincial legislature—Quebec Act 58 Vict. c. 69—Bye-law of corporation granting exclusive rights—Construction.—Under a bye-law of the Hull City Council, afterwards declared valid by the appellants' incorporating Act (Quebec, 58 Vict. c. 69), the appellants obtained an exclusive right of establishing a system of electric lighting for a certain term of years in the said city, and thereupon sued to revoke a licence previously granted by the city to the respondents for a similar purpose.

Held, that the Quebec Act, passed in favour of a purely local undertaking, was within the exclusive competence of the provincial legislature, and none the less so because it excluded for a limited time the competition of rival traders:

Held, also, that by the true construction of the bye-law the city did not themselves revoke the licence to the respondents under which they were actually supplying electric light to the municipality nor give to the appellants the right to have it revoked, and that the respondents were free to carry on their operations until revocation was effected.—HULL ELECTRIC CO. v. OTTAWA ELECTRIC CO., P.C.; [1902] A. CAPE OF GOOD HOPE, LAW of:—

Construction—Title—Terms of grant—Diagram.—In a grant of land with certain specified boundaries, "as will further appear by the diagram framed by the surveyor,"

Held, that as a matter of construction where the diagram is repugnant to the terms of the grant the latter will prevail, although, by articles 8 and 13 of the Proclamation of the 6th of August, 1813, there must be a diagram before a title be granted, yet the right of the grantee must be expressed in his title, and when so expressed will not be limited by the diagram.—HORNE v. STRUBEN, P.C.; [1902] A. 1. Appeal—Jurisdiction—Appeal to House of Lords from order of Court of Appeal in Ireland.—No appeal lies to the House of Lords from an order of the Court of Appeal in Ireland with respect to the issue of a writ of certiorari.—REG. v. BARTON, H.L.; [1902] A. C. 268.

2. Writ of certiorari—Removal of action from inferior court—Common law right—Liverpool Court of Passage—5 Vict. c. lii., ss. 2, 3—56 & 57 Vict. c 37, s. 5.—At common law a writ of certiorari issues as of right to remove an action from an inferior court to the High Court. The Act 5 Vict. c. lii., s. 2, and the Liverpool Court of Passage Act, 1893, s. 5, do not take away this right, but the former Act merely imposes on its exercise the condition that recognizances shall be given unless the judge dispenses with them. The application for the writ is in time, within section 3 of the former Act, if it be made within one month of the delivery of the statement of claim.—EDWARDS v. LIVERPOOL CORPORATION, K.B.D.; 86 L. CEYLON, LAW of:—

Practice—Appeal—Point not raised in court below—Validity of will.—The respondents, the next-of-kin of the testator, presented a petition for the revocation of the probate of his will on the ground that he was not of sound mind, and that the will was obtained by undue influence. The court of first instance decided in their favour. The executrix appealed, and the Court of Appeal held the will good so far as regarded the personal estate of the testator, but invalid so far as regarded his real estate, which was considerable. No such point had been raised at the trial, at which the will was attacked and defended as a whole. The executrix appealed, but there was no cross-appeal by the next-of-kin.

Held, that the course taken by the Court of Appeal was not correct according to the rule laid down by the House of Lords in The Tasmania (63 L. T. R. 1, 15 App. Cas. 223), that a Court of Appeal ought only to decide in favour of an appellant on a ground put forward for the first time on the hearing of the appeal if it be satisfied that it has before it beyond all doubt all the facts bearing upon the new contention as completely as if it had been raised at the trial; but, in the absence of a cross-appeal by the next-of-kin, the decision must be affirmed, but without costs.—KARUNARATNE v. FERDINANDUS, P.C.; [1902] A. C. 405; 86 L. T. 329.

CHARITY:—

1. Gift of proceeds of sale of real estate—Retention of land unsold—Leave of court—Mortmain and Charitable Uses Act, 1891 (54 & 55 Vict. c. 73), ss. 3, 5, 6, and 8.—Where land is devised to trustees upon trust to sell the same and hand the proceeds of sale over to a charity, the subject-matter of the gift being "personal estate arising from or connected with land," which is excepted from the definition of land contained in the Mortmain and Charitable Uses Act, 1891, sections 5 and 6 of that Act do not apply, and it is competent to the trustees to retain the land unsold for more than a year after the death of the testator without obtaining the leave of the court therefor under section 5 of the Act, though it would probably be expedient for them to obtain such leave under the general jurisdiction of the court to administer trusts. In such a case section 8 of the Mortmain and Charitable Uses Act, 1891, has no application to the land devised by the will, unless the charity has money to purchase land under the provisions of some other will. — SIDEBOTTOM, RE, BEELEY v. WATERHOUSE, C.A., 641; 72 L. J. Ch. 662.

2. Inn of Chancery—School of learning—Study of the law—Failure of object—Disposition of property—Charitable purpose.—The Society of Clifford's Inn was one of the Inns of Chancery which were established to provide for the legal education of students of the law. In the year 1618 by an indenture of feoffment the messuages and premises occupied by the society were assured to certain members thereof as trustees, in consideration of the payment of a sum of money, and the reservation of certain rents. The indenture declared that the intention of the grantors was that the messuage commonly called Clifford's Inn, which was stated to have been for many years used and employed as an Inn of Chancery for the study and practice of the common laws of the realm, and to have been governed to the good of the Commonwealth and the honour of the grantors and their ancestors, "shall and may hereafter continue to be employed as an Inn of Chancery for the furtherance of the practisers and students of the common law of the realm as aforesaid," and that the society should from thenceforth be assured of a certain estate therein, and the operative part of the deed declared that the true intent and meaning thereof, and of the parties thereto was that "Clifford's Inn shall for ever hereafter be continued and employed as an inn of Chancery for the good of the gentlemen of the society and for the benefit of the Commonwealth as aforesaid and not otherwise." The property had long been dealt with by the society as its own, and for its own purposes, and the surviving members contended that it was not now subject to or affected by any charitable trust, but belonged to the individual members for their own personal benefit, to be divided and disposed of as they might think fit.

Held, that the property vested in the present trustees was held by them upon trust for charitable purposes.

Judgment of Cozens-Hardy, J., [1900] 2 Ch. 511, affirmed.—SMITH v. KERR, C.A.; [1902] 1 Ch. 774; 71 L. J. Ch. 369; 86 L. T. 477.

3. Land on trust for sale, devise of—"Personal estate arising from land"—Right of trustees to retain land unsold—Gift to charity—Mortmain and Charitable Uses Act, 1891 (54 & 55 Vict. c. 73), ss. 3, 5.—Land was devised to trustees on trust to sell and to hold the proceeds, after making certain payments thereout, upon trust for a charity. The will contained a power to the trustees to postpone sale.

Held, that the subject-matter of the gift, being "personal estate arising from land," was within the exception from the definition of "land" contained in section 3 of the Mortmain and Charitable Uses Act, 1891, and that therefore section 5 of the Act was not applicable, and it was competent for the trustees, without obtaining the leave of the court, to retain the land unsold after the expiration of one year from the death of the testator.—WILKINSON, RE, ESAM v. ATTORNEY-GENERAL, Ch.D. Kekewich, J.; [1902] 1 Ch. 841; 71 L. J. Ch. 663.

4. Mortmain—Will—Construction—Bequest of money to be laid out in purchase of land and erection thereon of model dwellings to be let to poor at low rents—Validity—"Charitable uses."—A testator, who died in 1900, devised and bequeathed his residuary real and personal estate to trustees upon trust to sell and convert and to stand possessed of the proceeds upon trust from time to time to purchase land in populous places and to erect upon the land so purchased model dwellings, and to let the same to the poor at low rents.

Held, that the testator had manifested a general charitable intention to provide model dwellings for the poor, and therefore that the effect of striking out the direction to purchase land in accordance with section 7 of the Mortmain and Charitable Uses Act, 1891, was not to put an end to the whole charitable trust.

Held, therefore, that the residuary gift was valid.

The words "charitable uses" in section 7 of the Act of 1891 have the same meaning as the words "the purposes of the charity" in section 8 of the Act.

Semble, the Working Classes Dwellings Act, 1890, is not an Act dealing with charity matters.—SUTTON, RE, LEWIS v. SUTTON, Ch.D. Buckley, J.; [1901] 2 Ch. 640; 70 L. J. Ch. 747; 85 L. T. 411.

5. Tithes—Annual payment of corn to poor of parish—Charge on great tithes—Inclosure Act—Lands allotted in lieu of tithes—Sale of lands—Lands subject to charge—Mortgagee—Notice of charge—Inclosure Act, 1830 (11 Geo. 4, c. 4), ss. 37, 66—Charitable Trusts (Recovery) Act, 1891 (54 & 55 Vict. c. 17)—Conveyancing Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 39), s. 3, sub-section 1 (ii.).—In 1881 the defendant purchased from the Ecclesiastical Commissioners certain lands which, in 1834, had been allotted to their predecessors in title under the Inclosure Act, 11 Geo. 4, c. 4, in lieu of the great tithes of the parish of H. There was evidence that from time immemorial an annual payment of a certain quantity of corn had been made out of the tithes for the benefit of the poor of the parish, and from 1834 to 1881 the same payment had been made by the owners or occupiers of the lands in question. The conveyance to the defendant was expressed to be made "free from incumbrances," but was also expressly subject to the unredeemed land tax, tithe commutation rent-charge, both rectorial and vicarial, and to all other payments and outgoings, ecclesiastical or civil, charged upon or payable out of the lands conveyed.

Held, that the payment of corn constituted a valid charge to which the lands allotted in lieu of the tithes became subject by virtue of section 66 of the Inclosure Act, and that the defendant by the terms of his conveyance took the lands subject to the charge.

The defendant had mortgaged the lands by a deed which expressly stated in terms similar to those used in the conveyance that the mortgage was subject to all payments and outgoings, ecclesiastical or civil, charged upon or payable out of the mortgaged property. The mortgagee had made no inquiry as to the existence of any charges upon the property.

Held, that, having regard to section 3, sub-section 1 (ii.), of the Conveyancing Act, 1882, the mortgagee must be taken to have had notice of the charge in question, and that the mortgaged property was subject thereto.—THE ALMS CORN CHARITY, RE, CHARITY COMMISSIONERS v. BODE, *Ch D. COMPANY:—

1. Articles of association—Capital—Minimum subscription—Mistake—Rectification by court—Jurisdiction—Companies Act, 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 89), s. 50—Companies Act, 1900 (63 & 64 Vict. c. 48), ss. 4, 6.—Under its ordinary jurisdiction to rectify written instruments the court has no power to rectify a mistake in the articles of association of a company which have been executed by the seven signatories to the memorandum, although no one else has come in under the articles and no shares have been allotted.

The proper mode of rectifying a mistake is by section 50 of the Companies Act, 1862, which has only a statutory effect.—EVANS v. CHAPMAN, Ch.D. Joyce, J.; 86 L. T. 381.

2. Articles of association—Construction—Preference shares—"Net profits"—Reserve fund—Discretion of directors—"Interest"—Depreciation fund.—In an action by preference shareholders in a company claiming that they were entitled by contract to be paid a preferential dividend out of the balance to the credit of the profit and loss account in each year before the appropriation of any part of such balance to a reserve fund or any carrying over,

Held, that such a question, as well as that of a depreciation fund, is to be answered according to to the circumstances of each particular case, the nature of the company and the evidence of competent witnesses.

In the present case, special resolutions creating the preference shares were to be read as subject to the provisions of the original articles of association, and a provision for the payment of "net profits" towards arrears of dividend due on such preference shares was not sufficient to rescind the articles relating to declaration of dividends and formation of reserve fund.

Per Farwell, J.: "Interest is compensation for delay in payment, and is not accurately applied to the share of profits of trading, although it may be used as an inaccurate mode of expressing the measure of the share of such profits."

"There is no hard and fast rule by which the court can determine what is capital and what is profits."

The court is unlikely to compel directors of a company to pay dividends when they have expressed their opinion that the state of the accounts does not admit of any such payment.—BOND v. BARROW HÆMATITE STEEL CO, Ch.D. Farwell, J., 295; [1902] 1 Ch. 353; 71 L. J. Ch. 246; 86 L. T. 10.

3. Borrowing powers—Surplus lands—Ultra vires.—It is not ultra vires for a company incorporated by statute, with express powers of borrowing upon mortgage limited to mortgages on its undertaking, to offer its surplus lands as additional security in arranging for the transference of an existing debt where the creditor would be entitled to levy execution against such lands.—STAGG v. MEDWAY NAVIGATION CO., Ch.D. Eady, J., 446.

4. Capital—Reduction of capital—Available assets—Reserve fund—Unappropriated profits—Preference shares.—The court will not confirm a reduction of capital where it would work unjustly or inequitably. The court therefore refused to confirm a reduction which would benefit the ordinary shareholders at the expense of the preference shareholders.

In ascertaining the available assets of a company for the purpose of a reduction of capital, the amounts of reserve and unappropriated profit, and the value of the goodwill, are to be taken into account.

Decision of Cozens-Hardy, J., [1900] 2 Ch. 846, affirmed (49 W. R. Dig. 24).—BARROW HÆMATITE STEEL CO., RE, C.A., 71; [1901] 2 Ch. 746; 71 L. J. Ch. 15; 85 L. T. 493.

5. Capital—Reduction of capital—Deferred shares—Scheme—No actual reduction—Illegality.—A company entered into an agreement with the holders of its deferred shares of £1 each (to which special rights were attached) that in consideration of the cancellation of the deferred shares the holders thereof should receive ordinary shares in exchange for each deferred share. The company now petitioned the court for an order confirming the reduction of capital.

Held, that, having regard to all the circumstances of the case, the capital of the company was not being reduced, but increased; that the scheme was illegal and ultra vires, and the reduction could not be confirmed.—DEVELOPMENT CO. OF CENTRAL AND WEST AFRICA, RE, Ch.D. Eady, J., 456; [1902] 1 Ch. 547; 71 L. J. Ch. 310; 86 L. T. 323.

6. Contract with third person for intended company—Privity—Adoption—Inferred contract—Right of action.—The plaintiff company entered into an agreement with A. B. to grant to him or a company to be formed by him an exclusive licence to use certain patents. A. B. then entered into an agreement with C. D. to sell the licence to him on behalf of the intended company, and this agreement was adopted by the intended company, the defendants, by another agreement to which A. B., C. D., and the defendant company were parties.

Held, that, there being no privity of contract between the plaintiffs and defendants, and no contract which could be inferred or considered as having been adopted by the conduct of the defendants, the plaintiffs had no right of action against them.

Decision of Kekewich, J. (49 W. R. 265, [1901] 1 Ch. 196), affirmed.—BAGOT PNEUMATIC TYRE CO. v. CLIPPER PNEUMATIC TYRE CO., C.A., 177; [1902] 1 Ch. 146; 71 L. J. Ch. 158; 85 L. T. 652.

7. Debentures—Conditions—"Compromise or adjustment of any claim"—"Release of property charged"—Extension of period for redemption—Increase of debenture stock—Power of majority to bind dissentient minority.—By one of the conditions as to the issue of the debenture stock of a company it was provided that a meeting of the holders might, by a resolution of three-fourths, agree to any "compromise or adjustment of any claim" by the holders against the company, or for the settlement of any question in dispute, or the "giving of time to the company for the payment of any principal or interest or the release of the property or any portion thereof charged to secure the stock"; and that such resolution should bind all the holders. Debenture stock to the extent of £75,000 had been issued by the company, which was redeemable on the 1st of October, 1901. The directors had endeavoured to raise funds to redeem the stock, but the negotiations were unsuccessful. The company, therefore, was not in a position to redeem on the 1st of October, 1901, and the redemption could not be carried out without prejudicing the stockholders themselves. In these circumstances the company convened a meeting of the stockholders under the above conditions, at which two resolutions were passed by a majority present—one extending the period for redemption of the stock until the 1st of July, 1904, and the other authorizing the increase of the stock up to £100,000 by the issue of £25,000 further stock to rank pari passu with the existing stock.

Held, that the condition was not limited to cases where disputes had arisen within the strict meaning of that term, but was applicable to a case where difficulties had to be met; and that, therefore, under the circumstances the majority of the debenture stockholders acting honestly and bonâ fide, and with a view to the preservation and improvement of their security, had power to bind the minority under the language of the condition when passing the resolutions.—WALKER v. ELMORE'S GERMAN METAL CO., C.A.; 85 L. 8. Debentures—Costs—Taxation—Trustees' costs—Same solicitor appearing for trustees and company—Disallowance of company's costs—Right of trustees to full set of costs—Retainer—Joint or separate—Debenture-holders' action.—Where debentures are secured by a trust deed, the trustees are properly added as defendants to a debenture-holders' action, and where the trustees and the company appear by the same solicitor, although the company are not entitled to costs, all the costs of the defendants, except any separate costs of the company, ought to be paid out of the assets before distribution amongst the debenture-holders, upon the ground that, subject to that exception, those costs must be treated as incurred by the trustees; and for this puspose the order directing taxation should contain a direction that in taxing the costs of the trustees the taxing-master should allow them a full set of costs, except as regards any separate costs of the company, notwithstanding that the trustees and the company have appeared by the same solicitor.—MORTGAGE INSURANCE CORPORATION (LIMITED) v. CANADIAN AGRICULTURAL, COAL AND COLONIZATION CO., *Ch.D. 9. Debentures—Extension of time for registration—Companies Act, 1900 (63 & 64 Vict. c. 48), s. 15—Application subsequent to resolution for voluntary winding up—Form of order.—An application for an order under section 15 of the Companies Act, 1900, extending the time for registration of debentures was not made until after the passing of a special resolution for the voluntary winding up of the company and the appointment of a liquidator.

Held, that the principle of Crew v. Cummings, 36 W. R. 908, 21 Q. B. D. 420, and In re Parsons, Ex parte Furber, 41 W. R. 468, [1893] 2 Q. B. 122, extended to cases in which the rights of third parties had actually accrued and might be prejudicially affected if registration were allowed without protecting those rights. The order was consequently made "without prejudice to the rights of parties acquired prior to the time when such debentures shall be actually registered."—SPIRAL GLOBE CO., RE, *Ch.D. 17. Director—Remuneration—Condition precedent—Apportionment—Articles of association.—The articles of association of a company provided that the directors should be allowed to receive as remuneration for their services a certain sum per annum "to be paid at such times as they may determine."

Held, that the words "to be paid at such times as they may determine" did not merely enable the directors to apportion the remuneration for periods less than a year, but constituted a condition to the right of a director to receive any remuneration.—CARIDAD COPPER MINING CO. v. SWALLOW, C.A., 565; [1902] 2 K. 18. Director—Resale by director to company—Distribution of profits—Investment of funds—"Staff."—There is no obligation on a joint stock company to distribute, whilst it continues as a going concern, the whole of its profits amongst its shareholders. What sum shall be retained, what carried to the credit of a reserve fund, or appropriated to any other use of the company, are matters of internal management which the shareholders must decide for themselves, subject to the regulations of their articles of association or bye-laws. The investment of the reserve fund may be made in such securities as the directors, subject to the powers of a general meeting, may think fit, provided they do not by speculation or otherwise abuse the authority for this purpose intrusted to them.

Should a director purchase property solely on his own behalf and afterwards sell the same to the company at an increased price, he will not be liable in damages where it is not shown that he did not make a full disclosure, or that the price was an unfair one.—BURLAND v. EARLE, P.C., 241; [1902] A. 19. Estoppel—Certification—Transfer—Secretary—Director.—A company is not estopped by the certification of its secretary if he gives a receipt or an acknowledgment for certificates which have not been lodged with him. Those who deal with a company must be cognizant of the company's memorandum and articles of association; and a managing or other director of a company cannot bind the company, by estoppel or otherwise, in contravention of the regulations in the memorandum or articles of association.

Where the secretary of a company falsely certified that certificates of shares had been deposited, and this was done for the purpose of enabling a fraud to be carried out,

Held, in an action for damages for refusing to place the name of the respondent on the register of a company, that the company were not estopped by the action of their secretary from setting up the true state of facts, and, as his conduct was unauthorized and outside the scope of his employment, the company were justified in not registering the respondent as transferee.

20. Illegality—Unregistered association of more than twenty members—Right to maintain action—Companies Act, 1862, s. 4—Friendly Societies Act, 1896.—The trustees of an unregistered association of more than twenty persons formed for mutual insurance against death and accident sued the late treasurer for moneys of the society which he had converted to his own use.

Held, that the society was not rendered illegal by the Companies Act, 1862, for want of registration, and that the plaintiffs were not precluded from maintaining the action by reason of non-registration under that Act or the Friendly Societies Act, 1896.—MARRS v. THOMPSON, K.B.D.; 86 L. 21. Interim dividend—Declaration of, by directors—Withdrawal—Indefeasible right of shareholders to payment—Articles of association.—It was provided by the articles of association of a company that "the directors might from time to time pay to the members on account of the next forthcoming dividend such interim dividends as, in their judgment, the position of the company justified."

On the 16th of March, 1897, at a meeting of the directors, it was resolved that an interim dividend be declared for the current year at the rate of 4 per cent. per annum, payable on the 20th of April, 1897. On the 12th of April, 1897, the directors resolved that, having regard to certain litigation then pending, the payment of the proposed interim dividend should be postponed; and on the 13th of April, 1897, the company requested their bankers to set aside out of money in their hands belonging to the company, under a special account intituled "Interim Dividend Account," a sum of £36,000 to cover the dividend, pending the company's instructions. The company now claimed a declaration that neither they nor their bankers were bound to apply the said sum of £36,000 or any part thereof in payment of that dividend.

Held, that the company were entitled to such a declaration.—LAGUNAS NITRATE CO. v. SCHROEDER, Ch.D. Joyce, J.; 85 L. T. 22.

22. Memorandum of association—Main object—Subsidiary objects—Ultra vires—Injunction.—The objects clause of a memorandum of association of a gold mining company consisted of a large number of paragraphs which embraced objects apparently remote from gold mining. One paragraph stated that these objects should in no wise be limited or restricted by reference to or reference from the terms of any other paragraph or the name of the company.

Held, that the paragraphs in the clause were to be construed as giving the company full and ample powers to do a number of things, but in a manner subsidiary and subordinate to the main business, and an injunction was granted restraining the company from carrying out a scheme which clearly did not come within the main business of the company.—STEPHENS v. MYSORE REEFS (KANGUNDY) MINING CO. 23. Memorandum upon register of members—Lien of company—Trustee in bankruptcy of shareholder—Form of certificate—Companies Act, 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 89), Table A, article 13.—The trustee in bankruptcy of a shareholder in a company applied to be registered as owner of shares standing in the bankrupt's name. The company had, under their articles, a lien upon shares for debts due to them from their members. The company alleged that there were debts due to them from the bankrupt, and they registered the trustee as owner of the shares, but they put upon the register a memorandum of their claim to the lien, and claimed to put a note to the same effect upon the certificate of the shares.

Held, that the company were not entitled to put such a memorandum upon the register, and it must be removed therefrom.

Semble, that the certificate of the shares must be granted in accordance with the register, and the company were not entitled to place any such note or memorandum upon it.—KEY & SON, RE. Ch D. Byrne, J., 234; [1902] 1 Ch. 467; 71 L. J. Ch. 254; 86 L. T. 374.

Held, applying the principle of Wright v. Horton, 36 W. R. 17, 12 App. Cas. 371, that plaintiffs had established a right to the protection of their trade-name.

26. Practice—Originating summons—Construction of "written instrument"—Company—Articles of association—Questions affecting class of shareholders—Preference shares—R. S. C., 1883, ord. 16, r. 32 (b); ord. 54 (a), rr. 1, 2.—A company proposing to issue new preference shares ranking pari passu with its existing preference shares served on one of its preference shareholders (sued on behalf of himself and the other preference shareholders) an originating summons for the determination of certain questions, with reference to the proposed issue, arising on the construction of the articles of association.

Buckley, J., refused to appoint the defendant to represent the class, and said that he would not decide the questions so as to bind the class of preference shareholders unless a meeting of them was first called and nominated a person to represent them, in which case he would appoint him to represent the class. He, however, decided the question as between the company and the defendant.—MORGAN'S BREWERY CO. v. CROSSKILL, Ch.D. Buckley, J.; [1902] 1 Ch. 898; 71 L. J. Ch. 585.

27. Prospectus — Contract by company—Omission from prospectus—Rights to be "honourably met"—Cancelled contract—Cancelling contract—Untrue statement—Companies Act, 1867 (30 & 31 Vict. c. 131), s. 38—Directors' Liability Act, 1890 (53 & 54 Vict. c. 64), s. 3.—By an agreement of the 9th of May, 1898, a promoter agreed to float a company for a sum equal to one per cent. on its nominal capital. Subsequently it was resolved to purchase the business of another company as a going concern, and the company, by a letter of the 21st of September, a resolution of the 1st of October, and a letter of the 1st of October, entered into a contract with the promoter by which the promoter agreed to advance the sum of £14,250, which was required as a deposit in respect of the purchase, and the company agreed to repay him that amount together with a commission of £7,500. The agreement of purchase was signed on the 26th of September. The directors of the vendor company, some of whom were to join the board of the new company, objected to the payment of the £7,500. The promoter was accordingly assured that his right to receive proper remuneration for commission would be honourably met, and, with his consent, the contract contained in the letter of the 21st of September was cancelled by a resolution of the 10th of October and a letter of the 18th of October. Subsequently the directors issued a prospectus in which it was stated, on the advice of counsel, that the only contracts to which the company was a party were those of the 9th of May and the 26th of September.

Held, that the contract to pay the promoter the commission of £7,500 contained in the letter of the 21st of September, the resolution of the 1st of October, and the letter of the 1st of October was not wholly cancelled by the contract contained in the resolution of the 10th of October, and the letter of the 18th of October, and that in any event both contracts should have been disclosed in the prospectus under section 38 of the Companies Act, 1867, and that the statement in the prospectus that the only contracts to which the company was a party were those of the 9th of May and the 26th of September was a false statement within the Directors' Liability Act, 1890.

Held, also, that the fact that the contracts were omitted from the prospectus on the advice of counsel was no defence to an action under either statute.—BROOME v. SPEAK, Ch.D. Buckley, J., 614.

28. Prospectus—Director—Promoter—Underwriter—Contract by directors and promoters—Omission from prospectus—Materiality—Careful investor—Companies Act, 1867 (30 & 31 Vict. c. 131), s. 38.—In order that a shareholder may obtain relief under section 38 of the Companies Act, 1867, for non-disclosure in the prospectus of a material contract, he must show that he applied for his shares on the faith of that prospectus, and that such prospectus had been "knowingly issued" by the promoters and directors of the company before he acted upon it.

An underwriter who pays attention to nothing in the prospectus but the names of the directors will not be considered by the court as a careful investor in determining the materiality of a contract not disclosed in the prospectus.—BATY v. KESWICK, Ch.D. Farwell, J., 14; 85 L. T. 18.

29. Prospectus—Director—Promoter—Shareholder—Contract by directors and promoters—Omission from prospectus—"Fraudulent" prospectus—Waiver clause—Measure of damages—Companies Act, 1867 (30 & 31 Vict. c. 131), s. 38.—An arrangement under which the promoters and directors of a company about to be formed agreed with a firm that, in consideration of the latter's underwriting 10,000 shares in the company, the firm was to receive 12,000 vendor shares as commission therefor, but 10,000 shares were in fact for the use of the firm's name on the prospectus on their approving of the soundness of the undertaking; and, further, that the firm was to be appointed commercial agents of the company, whose registered office was to be located at its address, while a member of the firm was to go on the prospectus as chairman of the company, held to be a contract material to be disclosed in the prospectus within the meaning of the 38th section of the Companies Act, 1867.

The 38th section cannot be evaded by a "waiver clause" saying that "there may also be various trade contracts and business arrangements" in a case where such a contract as that mentioned above has not been disclosed in the prospectus.

In refusing to give effect, as against a shareholder, to such a waiver clause, and in holding that the prospectus by reason of the omission of a material contract is "fradulent" within the meaning of the 38th section, the court will measure the damages due to the shareholder by the difference between the amount paid by him for his shares and the actual value of the shares on the day after they were allotted to him.

30. Reduction of capital—Unequal payments upon ordinary shares—Losses to be borne proportionately.—The deferred shares in a company were paid up in full, the ordinary shares of £10 each were as to some paid up to £5 each, as to others up to £2. The articles of association of the company provided that in the case of a winding up the losses were to be borne by the members in proportion to the capital paid up. The company passed a special resolution that the ordinary shares be reduced from £10 to £8 10s., cancelling capital to the extent of £1 10s. on each ordinary share.

Held, that the same rule must be followed in the reduction of capital as would have been followed in a winding up, and that the losses must be borne by the members in proportion to the capital paid up on the shares.—CREDIT ASSURANCE AND GUARANTEE CORPORATION, RE, Ch.D. Farwell, J., 629; [1902] 2 Ch. 178.

31. Registration—Similarity of name—Deception—Companies Act, 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 89), s. 20.—The plaintiffs carried on business under the name of "Aerators (Limited)." The defendants sought to register a company under the name of "Automatic Aerator Patents (Limited)."

Held, that a name is not necessarily calculated to deceive because it is similar, and that on the facts there was not any probability of deception, and that the plaintiffs were not entitled to restrain the defendants from registering their company.—AERATORS (LIMITED) v. TOLLIT, Ch.D. Farwell, J., 584; [1902] 2 Ch. 319; 86 L. T. 651.

32. Shares—Agreement to vote in a particular way—Executors—Directors.—Executors holding shares in a company agreed to sell part of them to G., who stipulated that as part of transaction he should nominate X. and W. as directors, and that the executors should, when either X. or W. should retire by rotation, vote for and not against his re-election. The agreement extended to shares, whether held by the executors in that capacity or in their own personal capacity. W. was about to retire by rotation, and some of the executors threatened to oppose his re-election.

Held, that the agreement was valid as regarded shares held by the executors, either as such or as directors, and that on W. undertaking to retire, if required by the court, at the ordinary meeting next after the trial, an injunction must be granted until the trial restraining such of the executors as threatened to do so from voting against the re-election of W. on his retirement by rotation.—GREENWELL v. PORTER, *Ch.D. 33. Shares—Call for whole amount remaining unpaid — Non-payment — Forfeiture — Sale — Condition that purchaser be discharged from prior calls—Subsequent call—Liability of purchaser.—A limited company, having power to do so, forfeited shares for non-payment by the holders of a call for the full amount remaining unpaid thereon. The company then sold the shares to the defendants, the contract of sale providing that the shares were to be deemed to be discharged from all prior calls. Subsequently, the call being still unpaid, the company made in substitution therefor a further call.

Held, that the contract of sale did not protect the defendants from liability for the subsequent call.—RANDT GOLD MINING CO. v. NEW BALKIS EERSTELING, K.B.D.; 71 L. J. K. B. 346; 85 L. T. 780.

L. having subscribed the memorandum of a company on the faith of misrepresentations made to him by S., a promoter of the company, held liable on the shares for which he had subscribed the memorandum, because (1) a company cannot appoint an agent before it comes into existence itself; and (2) L. on registration became bound, not only as between himself and the company, but also as between himself and all future members.

and such other evidence as the company may require to prove the title of the transferor or his right to transfer the shares—the mere leaving of such transfer and the certificate of shares at the office of the company before the company had notice of any prior equitable claim to the shares, is not sufficient to give the legal title to the transferee so as to oust the prior equitable owner, and is not of itself sufficient to give the transferee a "present absolute unconditional right" to the shares.—IRELAND v. HART, *Ch.D. 39. Winding up—Assets—"Surplus assets"—Loss of capital—Profits earned before winding up—Dividend not declared—Rights of preference and ordinary shareholders inter se.—The capital of a trading company consisted of £10 shares, preference and ordinary, all paid up in full, the former being entitled to a cumulative preferential dividend. The articles of association empowered the directors to set aside out of the profits such sums as they thought proper as a reserve fund. For some years the preferential dividend was paid, and then for three years the business was carried on at a loss, the result being a loss of capital to the amount of £4,346 In the next year there was a profit of £1,675 on the year's trading, but the directors did not declare a dividend or make any appropriation of that sum. The company went into voluntary liquidation, the debts were all paid, and the capital, to the extent of £7 per share, was returned to the shareholders. The sum of £1,675 remained in the hands of the liquidator.

Held, upon the construction of the articles, that the preference shareholders were not entitled to have this sum applied in paying them dividends for the four years in which they had received none, but that it must be divided as capital rateably among all the shareholders.

The jurisdiction to make a compulsory order is not limited to cases either where the voluntary liquidation is proved to be a sham or a fraud, or where the petition is supported by creditors, but may be exercised wherever the court is satisfied that the voluntary liquidation is existing in circumstances which are likely to prejudice the shareholders, and that some benefit will result to the shareholders by the exercise of the jurisdiction.

During the pendency of the voluntary winding up of a company, having surplus assets, a petition for a compulsory winding-up order was presented by a fully-paid shareholder.

Held, that the case was not one in which the court would exercise its jurisdiction to make a compulsory order, the evidence not being sufficient to show that any benefit would thereby result to the shareholders. The petition was therefore dismissed, but, in the circumstances, without costs.—NATIONAL COMPANY FOR THE DISTRIBUTION OF ELECTRICITY, RE, C.A.; [1902] 2 Ch. 34.

CONFLICT OF LAWS:

1. Fund in court — French subject entitled — "Prodigal"—Status — Capacity to sue — "Conseil judiciaire"—Code Napoleon, section 513—Payment out.—By the Code Napoleon a French subject of full age, who is of extravagant habits, when adjudged by a French court of competent jurisdiction to be a "prodigal," is restrained from dealing with, disposing of, alienating, receiving, or giving a receipt for his movable property without the consent of a conseil judiciaire (legal adviser). But, although this judgment modifies and affects the status of the "prodigal," it is a disqualification unknown to English law, and will be disregarded by English courts.

Where, therefore, a French subject of full age, who had been adjudged a "prodigal," and placed under the control of a conseil judiciaire by the judgment of a French court of competent jurisdiction, became entitled to a fund in court in England:

Held, that he was entitled to payment out of the fund to himself on his sole receipt, notwithstanding the opposition of his conseil judiciaire.

2. Marriage—Deceased husband's brother—Italian subjects—Domicil—Lord Lyndhurst's Act (Marriage Act, 1835, 5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 54), s. 2.—A marriage was legally contracted in Italy between a woman and the brother of her deceased husband, the wife and both husbands being Italian subjects and domiciled in Italy.

Held, that the marriage was valid in England.—BOZZELLI'S SETTLEMENT, RE, HUSEY HUNT v. BOZZELLI, Ch.D. Eady, J., 447; [1902] 1 Ch. 751; 71 L. J. Ch. 505; 86 L. T. 445.

3. Tort in foreign country—Right of action—Foreign government—Jurisdiction.—To constitute an actionable wrong, where the injury is committed abroad, it must be actionable in the country where committed as well as in this country.

Where a British subject seized goods in Muscat waters, which act was authorized by the Sultan and therefore lawful in that country, no action lies in our courts for such seizure.—CARR v. FRACIS, H.L., 257; [1902] A. C. 176; 71 L. J. K. B. 361; 85 L. T. 144.

CONTRACT:—

1. Assignability—Contract to supply goods—Increase of burden by assignment.—T. contracted with the I. Co. to supply them for fifty years with at least 750 tons of chalk per week, and so much more as they might require for their manufacture of cement upon a certain piece of land, the chalk to be delivered in convenient daily quantities as required by the company by written notice given on the preceding day. The I. Co., which had a small capital and was doing a comparatively small business, went into voluntary liquidation and transferred all its business and property, and purported to assign this contract, to the A. Co., which was a very powerful company with a very large capital.

Held, that, as the result of the assignment would be to impose a greater liability and burden upon T., he was not bound to supply chalk to the A. Co.—TOLHURST v. ASSOCIATED PORTLAND CEMENT MANUFACTURERS (1900) (LIMITED), K.B.D.; [1901] 2 K. B. 811; 70 L. J. K. B. 1036.

2. Assignment of contract—Specific performance—Failure of consideration—Money had and received.—On the 16th of July B. entered into an agreement to buy certain mining claims from A., the purchase to be completed on or before the 8th of November, subject to the payment by B. of instalments of £400 per month. On the 18th of July B. sold the same property to C., on condition that C. paid a deposit and a sum of £230 per month up to the 1st of November. On the 18th of July B. assigned the benefit of his contract with C. to D. The deposit and the monthly contributions were paid by C. to D. for four months. In an action brought by D. against B. and C. for specific performance, C. counter-claimed the return of the deposit and the four instalments.

Held, that, on total failure of consideration, C. could recover his payments from D.—FLEMING v. LOE, Ch.D. Cozens-Hardy, J., 55; [1901] 2 Ch. 594; 70 L. J. Ch. 805; 85 L. T. 480.

3. Building contract—Penalties—Building owner to make allowances for delay—Final decision—Default by building owner—Exclusive jurisdiction of building owner.—By a building contract certain matters causing delay and "other causes beyond the contractor's control" were to be submitted to the board of directors of the owners of the building, who were to "adjudicate thereon and make due allowance therefor if necessary, and their decision shall be final."

Held, that the exclusive jurisdiction of the board did not extend to delay caused by interference by the building owners or their architect with the conduct of the works, by default in not giving the contractors possession of the premises, and in not providing plans and drawings in due time; and so, such interference and defaults being made out, the building owners could not recover penalties.—WELLS v. ARMY AND NAVY CO-OPERATIVE SOCIETY, K.B.D.; 86 L. T. 764.

4. Building ship—Delay—Allowances—"Circum- stances beyond builders' control."—A contract for building a ship provided that due allowance should be made for delays through certain causes "or other circumstances beyond the builders' control."

It was within the contemplation of the parties that the ship should be commenced as soon as a suitable berth became vacant, and the first berth which became vacant was one in which another ship was being built, and delay was caused in the completion of this ship by the same kind of causes which were provided for in the contract relating to the ship in question.

Held, that allowances were properly made for delay in building the ship in the contract owing to the delay in completing the former vessel.—LOCKIE & CRAGGS, RE, K.B.D.; 86 L. T. 388.

5. Parol evidence—Writing—Verbal warranty—Inadmissible to enlarge—Written warranty—Arbitration—Pleadings—Amendment.—Where a written contract exists, parol evidence may be given to prove a verbal warranty respecting a matter on which the written contract is wholly silent. Such evidence is not admissible so far as to enlarge the scope of a warranty which is contained in the written contract. A written contract stated: " . . . We hereby offer you ninety thousand pounds for the entire rights, assets, and liabilities of the above company, including the liabilities attaching to existing contracts as at this date. . . ." It also stated: "We agree to take over the liabilities of the company as under," setting out certain specific items.

Held, that it was for the arbitrator to construe the whole of the contract and the meaning of the word "liabilities" in the earlier part; that parol evidence was not admissible to show the meaning attached to the word by the parties when entering into the contract; and that there was no necessity for limiting the word "liabilities" in the first part to the particular liabilities set out later. Disputes having arisen between the plaintiffs and the defendants, it was agreed between them "that all points in dispute in reference to the contract for the sale and purchase of S. F." should be referred to the arbitration of some practical man. Points of claim and defence and counter-claim with particulars were delivered, and re-delivered on being amended, between the parties.

Held, that these documents were in the nature of pleadings or particulars, and could be amended by the arbitrator in his discretion, and all points in dispute between the parties relating to the subject-matter could be so raised, although not in the first instance disclosed by such documents.—EDWARD LLOYD (LIMITED) v. STURGEON FALLS PULP CO., K.B.D.; 85 L. 6. Restraint of trade—"Interested in" similar trade—Servant at a salary.—The manager of a jewellery business entered into a covenant with the proprietors of the business that he would not become interested in, either directly or indirectly, a similar trade or business to that carried on by the said proprietors. Subsequently he entered the employment of a firm in a similar business as an assistant at a fixed salary.

Held, that there was no breach of the covenant, as he had no "proprietary or pecuniary" interest in his new employment.—GOPHIR DIAMOND CO. v. WOOD, Ch.D. Swinfen Eady, J., 603; [1902] 1 Ch. 950; 71 L. J. Ch. 550; 86 L. T. 801.

7. Sale of business—Benefit of pending contracts—Assignment—Indemnity.—An agreement for the purchase and sale of a newspaper business contained a term or condition that the vendors should sell and the purchasers should purchase "the full benefit of all pending contracts and engagements and of all other property to which the vendors are or may be entitled in connection with the said journal."

Held, that the purchasers took the burden of pending contracts, and did not merely acquire an option to take the benefit of such contracts.—BOWATER & SONS v. MIRROR OF LIFE CO., K.B.D., 381.

8. Setting aside—Contract of service—Dismissal—Undue pressure.—In an action for salary due and damages for wrongful dismissal the defendants pleaded, inter alia, that by an agreement entered into by the plaintiff and the defendants, which agreement was embodied in a deed, the plaintiff had tendered his resignation, which had been accepted by the defendants, and that the plaintiff had accepted a certain sum of money in complete satisfaction and discharge of all his claims against the defendants. In his reply the plaintiff pleaded that he was induced to execute the deed by the defendants threatening unlawfully to imprison him unless he executed the same, and that he executed the deed in fear that the threat would be carried out, and that he had given no real or free consent to such execution. At the trial of the action two questions were left to the jury:

(1) Was the plaintiff induced to make the agreement by threats of the defendants of criminal proceedings or imprisonment? To which the jury returned the answer "No."

(2) Was the plaintiff induced to make the agreement by undue pressure exercised by the defendants to force the plaintiff to enter into the agreement? To which the jury returned the answer "Yes."

Held, on further consideration, that the answer of the jury to the second question was not sufficient to entitle the plaintiff to get rid of the deed and to fall back upon his original claims, and that judgment must be entered for the defendants.—BARNES v. RICHARDS, K.B.D., 363; 71 L. J. K. B. 341; 86 L. T. 231.

9. Statute of Frauds—Agreement for service—Time for commencement—Managing director.—A memorandum in writing of an agreement by a company to employ a managing director for a term of five years is not sufficient within the Statute of Frauds unless it shows the date at which the service is to begin.

Semble, it should also contain some definition of the nature of the service.—ALEXANDER'S TIMBER CO., RE, Ch.D. Wright, J.; 70 L J. Ch. 767.

COPYRIGHT:—

1. Artistic production—Toys—Models of soldiers—Sculpture Copyright Act, 1814 (54 Geo. 3, c. 56), s. 1—Stamping proprietor's name on models—Date of publication.—Metal models of mounted yeomen produced and sold as toys are, where there is evidence that they are anatomically and technically correct and display artistic skill and merit on the part of the producer, within the protection of the Sculpture Copyright Act, 1814.

The proviso in section 1 as to stamping such models with the proprietor's name is satisfied by the insertion of the name of one of the partners of the firm of proprietors, if he himself be the producer of the model.

The effect of the requirement in the same proviso as to the date of publication is that the date must not be misleading; and the insertion of a date upon the cast a few days earlier than the absolute date of putting forth and publication is no contravention of the proviso.—BRITAIN v. HANKS, K.B.D.; 86 L. T. 765.

2. Common sources of information—Infringement—Injunction.—An author may avail himself of common sources of information on a subject, but he is not entitled to save himself pains and labour by adopting a predecessor's work with but colourable variations, even though such predecessor's work is based on materials which are common property. Thus an author is not at liberty to avail himself of the taste and judgment of a predecessor in illustrating his work by quotations, nor can he justify taking such quotations on the ground that he has simply followed the references given by his predecessor and copied the quotations from the original works.

3. Encyclopædia—Contributor and publisher—Copyright Act, 1842 (5 & 6 Vict. c. 45), s. 18.—The copyright in articles contributed to an encyclopædia and paid for by the publisher, where there is no special agreement as to the copyright between contributor and publisher, and no special circumstances in the nature of the work or in the terms of the employment, is in the author and not in the publisher.—AFLALO v. LAWRENCE, *Ch.D. 4. Infringement—"Book"—Designs—Illustrations in catalogue—Sale of electrotypes—Personal licence—Right to assign.—In September, 1898, the plaintiffs, who were wholesale manufacturers of furs, mantles, &c., published a catalogue of designs containing twelve illustrations. The firm of E. & W., retail drapers, having obtained one of these catalogues, requested the plaintiffs to supply them with some of the electro blocks of the illustrations, and this the plaintiffs did, the price being 4s. 6d. each. E. & W. handed over these blocks to the defendants, P. & Sons, a firm of "fashion printers," for production in E. & W.'s catalogue. P. & Sons at the same time purchased the blocks of E. & W., deducting the price from their charge for the catalogues supplied to E. & W. In November, 1898, P. & Sons printed for the defendants, B. & Co., another firm of retail drapers, a catalogue containing eight illustrations from the blocks in question, but with different names. Thereupon the plaintiffs registered, under the Copyright Act, 1842, their catalogue containing the twelve illustrations, and brought an action against B. & Co. and P. & Sons claiming an injunction to restrain the defendants from reproduction and sale of the illustrations, and consequential relief. The action as against B. & Co. was stayed on certain terms. The defendants, P. & Sons, stated that they had purchased the blocks of E. & W. without any conditions or restrictions, and contended, amongst other defences, that the plaintiffs had no copyright in the illustrations, as they had not been registered under the Fine Arts Copyright Act, 1862, and that registration of the catalogue under the Copyright Act, 1842, simply as a "book" was not sufficient to protect the illustrations separately.

Held, that engravings published as part of a book, and registered for the purposes of copyright as a "book," were protected by the copyright of the book itself; that in the present case the plaintiffs had a copyright in the illustrations in question as part of their book; and that, the illustrations being a substantial part of the book, there had been an infringement of the book itself.—MARSHALL v. BULL, C.A.; 85 L. T. 77.

5. Infringement—Portions of one book printed by different printers—"Cause to be printed"—Copyright Act, 1842 (5 & 6 Vict. c. 45), s. 15.—A person who has contracted to print a book for another, but subsequently allows such other person to get a portion printed elsewhere, does not "cause" such portion to be printed within the meaning of section 15 of the Copyright Act, 1842, even, though his name appears on the title-page of the work as the printer.

CORPORATION:—

Statutory Power—Injury to individual—Remedy.—Where a public body, acting in the execution of their public duties for the public benefit, do an act which they are authorized by law to do, and the act, though done in a proper manner, causes special injury to a particular person, that person has no remedy unless one is given by statute. The appellant corporation, acting in pursuance of statutory powers, altered the gradient of a street in the town, and thereby seriously interfered with the access to the respondent's house. The Act under which the appellants acted made no provision for compensation in respect of consequential injury.

Held, that the respondent could not maintain an action against the corporation in respect of such injury. — EAST FREMANTLE (CORPORATION) v. ANNOIS, P.C.; [1902] A. C. 213; 71 L. J. P. C. 39; 85 L. T. 732.

2. Costs—Remitted action—Payment by defendant to plaintiff after action brought—Sum "recovered in the action"—County Courts Act, 1888 (51 & 52 Vict. c. 43), s. 116.—Section 116 of the County Courts Act, 1888, provides, with respect to actions brought in the High Court which could have been commenced in the county court, that if in an action founded on contract the plaintiff shall recover a sum less than £20, he shall not be entitled to any costs of the action.

An action founded on contract having been brought in the High Court to recover £27, the defendants, after appearance, paid £8 to the defendants, no judgment or order of the court having been given or made in respect of that payment. The action was subsequently remitted to the county court. In their particulars of claim in the county court the plaintiffs credited the defendants with a payment of £8, and claimed the balance—£19; but the particulars did not show that the payment had been made since action brought. The plaintiffs obtained judgment for £19 in the county court, the judgment in form being for £19, and not for that sum in addition to £8 credited in the particulars.

Held, that, although it should have appeared on the proceedings that the plaintiffs had recovered £19 in addition to £8 paid since action brought, they had in substance recovered in the action a sum not less than £20, and were, therefore, not disentitled to their costs by section 116.—PEARCE v. BOLTON, K.B.D.; [1902] 2 K. B. 111; 71 L. J. K. B. 558; 86 L. T. 530.

3. Practice—Appeal to High Court—Misdirection—Refusal of new trial.—Although a party who appeals directly to the High Court against the judgment of a county court judge on the ground of misdirection is not entitled to be heard unless he took the objection to the judge's direction at the time of the trial, it is otherwise if he first applies to the county court judge for a new trial on the ground of misdirection, and then upon being refused appeals to the High Court against such refusal. It is enough that the objection to the direction is taken for the first time upon the application for a new trial to the county court judge.—HANDLEY v. LONDON, EDINBURGH, AND GLASGOW ASSURANCE CO., K.B.D.; [1902] 1 K. B. 350; 71 L. J. K. B. 39.

4. Practice—Costs—Action which could have been commenced in a county court—Tort—Recovery of less than £10—Judgment for injunction and nominal damages—County Courts Act, 1888 (51 & 52 Vict. c. 43), s. 116, sub-section 2.—An action brought in the Chancery Division for an injunction and damages for trespass to land was transferred to a county court. The county court judge gave judgment for the defendant. On appeal, the King's Bench Division gave judgment for the plaintiff for an injunction and nominal damages.

Held, that the plaintiff was entitled to his costs.

An action which results in a judgment for an injunction and nominal damages is not an action in which the plaintiff recovers a sum less than ten pounds within the meaning of section 116 (2) of the County Courts Act, 1888.

6. Telephone company—Delegation of powers by Postmaster-General—Consent of local authority—Refusal of consent—Arbitration by county court judge—Jurisdiction—Prohibition.—The Postmaster-General delegated certain powers to the N. T. Co. under the Telegraph Acts, and the company made an agreement with the corporation of T. W. to exercise those powers within the borough in respect of certain specified works. It was provided by the agreement that, except in the case of the specified works, the company should not exercise any of the powers conferred on the Postmaster-General by the Acts, in respect of which the consent of the corporation was necessary, without the further written consent of the corporation. The company applied for the consent of the corporation to further works, but the consent was refused. The company then applied to the county court judge to arbitrate, under section 4 of the Telegraph Act, 1878, which provides that any difference arising between the Postmaster-General and a local authority shall be referred to the county court judge as an arbitrator.

Held, that the county court judge had no jurisdiction to entertain the application of the company, inasmuch as the corporation had an absolute right to refuse their consent to the proposed work and had not consented thereto.—NATIONAL TELEPHONE CO. v. TUNBRIDGE WELLS CORPORATION, C.A.; 85 L. T. 368.

COVENANT—

Judgment—Merger—Mortgage—Rate of interest—Ancillary and independent covenants.—A mortgage deed contained a proviso for redemption if the mortgagors should pay the principal with interest after the rate thereinafter covenanted. The mortgagors covenanted to repay the principal on a day named with interest at 5 per cent., and if the principal was not then paid, to pay interest at that rate half-yearly on so much of the principal as should remain unpaid. The mortgagors having made default, the mortgagees recovered judgment against them for principal and interest upon the covenant.

An action having been brought by another mortgagee for an account of all moneys due to incumbrancers, Held, that though the personal remedy on a covenant to pay a debt merges in a judgment and a judgment carries only 4 per cent. interest, yet upon the true construction of this mortgage deed the mortgagees were entitled to retain their security until they were paid the principal sum and interest at 5 per cent.

CRIMINAL LAW :—

1. Bankruptcy—Failure by debtor fully and truly to discover all his property to the trustee—Disclosure by debtor at private meeting of creditors—Intent to defraud—Admissibility of evidence negativing such intent—Debtors Act, 1869 (32 & 33 Vict. c. 62), s. 11, sub-sections 1, 2, 4, and 6.—Upon an indictment under section 11, sub-sections 1, 2, 4, and 6, of the Debtors Act, 1869, charging a bankrupt with not fully and truly discovering to the trustee all his property, evidence that the bankrupt at a private meeting of his creditors, held after the presentation of the bankruptcy petition, had disclosed all his property, is admissible for the purpose of negativing any intent on his part to defraud his creditors.—REX v WISEMAN, C.C.R., 333; 71 L. 2. Brothel—Permitting licensed premises to be used as brothel—Averment of commission of offence on different days—Continuing offence.—An information charged B. that he within six months then passed—namely, on the 26th, 28th, 29th, and 31st of January, and the 1st, 4th, 5th, and 6th of February, 1901—permitted his licensed house to be used as a brothel, contrary to section 15 of the Licensing Act, 1872.

Held, that the information was not bad for duplicity as charging the commission of two or more offences on different and discontinuous days, and that B. might be rightly convicted on it of the offence of permitting his house to be used as a brothel since that offence was a continuing offence. —REX v. BURNBY, K.B.D.; 85 L. T. 168.

3. Conspiracy—Joint indictment—Plea of guilty by one defendant—Acquittal of co-defendant—Withdrawal of plea of guilty—Practice—Stating case notwithstanding plea of guilty—11 & 12 Vict. c. 78.—One person cannot be convicted of conspiracy by himself.

If on a joint indictment for conspiracy one defendant pleads "guilty," but his co-defendants plead "not guilty" and are acquitted, the defendant who pleaded guilty must be allowed to withdraw his plea and must also be acquitted.

The court has jurisdiction to consider a case stated where a defendant has pleaded guilty.—REX v. PLUMMER, C.C.R.; 86 L. T. 836.

4. Conspiracy—Preventing due course of justice—Editor and Special "Crime Investigator"—Comments in newspaper about prisoners awaiting trial—Inference of intent.—It is a criminal offence to publish writings which are calculated or tend to influence the minds of the magistrates or jurors against a person who is to be brought before them for trial.

An act which tends to prevent the course of justice is a contempt of court, but it is none the less an indictable offence.

A conspiracy to publish an article in a newspaper may be inferred if the article could not have appeared in the newspaper without the concurrence of the persons charged with conspiracy.

Held, on a special case stated for the consideration of the Court for Crown Cases Reserved, that the publication of information concerning the antecedents of two prisoners who were awaiting trial was of such a character as to interfere with and obstruct the ordinary course of justice, and that inasmuch as the articles could not have appeared without the co-operation of the editor and the reporter, there was evidence of conspiracy by them. —REX v. 6. Evidence of previous convictions—Admissibility of at trial—Prevention of Crimes Act, 1871 (34 & 35 Vict. c. 112), s. 7.—Where the evidence of previous convictions is necessary in order to constitute a statutory offence, evidence of such convictions may be given at the trial of the prisoner.

Rex v. Brown, 65 J. P. 136, overruled.—REX v. PENFOLD, C.C.R, 671; [1902] 1 K. B. 547; 71 L. J. K. B. 306; 86 L. T. 204.

7. Evidence—Prisoners jointly indicted—Cross-examination of one prisoner by another—Criminal Evidence Act, 1898 (61 & 62 Vict. c. 36), s. 1 (f) (iii.).—Where two prisoners are tried together, and one of them gives evidence, under section 1 of the Criminal Evidence Act, 1898, on his own behalf, and in the course of it gives evidence incriminating the other prisoner, the former can be cross-examined by the latter as well as by the prosecution — REX v. HADWEN AND INGHAM, C.C.R, 589; [1902] 1 K. B. 882; 71 L. J. K.B. 581; 86 L. T. 601.

8. Evidence—Statement of affairs—24 & 25 Vict. c. 96, ss. 80, 85—Bankruptcy Act, 1890 (53 & 54 Vict. c. 71), s 27.—A statement of affairs made by a bankrupt in the course of bankruptcy is admissible as evidence against him on a charge of misappropriation, and does not come within the protection afforded by section 27 of the Bankruptcy Act of 1890.—REX v. PIKE, C.C.R., 672; [1902] 1 K. B. 552; 71 L. J. K. B. 287; 86 L. T. 205.

9. Indictment—Game—Night poaching—Previous convictions—Night Poaching Act, 1828 (9 Geo. 4, c. 69), ss. 1, 9.—By section 1 of the Night Poaching Act, 1828, it is enacted that if any person shall by night unlawfully enter or be in any land with any gun, net, engine, or other instrument for the purpose of taking or destroying game, such offender shall, for the first and second offences, be liable, on summary conviction, to certain terms of imprisonment, "and in case such person shall so offend a third time he shall be guilty of a misdemeanour." By section 9 of the same Act it is enacted that if any persons, to the number of three or more, shall by night unlawfully enter or be in any land for the purpose of taking or destroying game, "any of such persons being armed with any gun, crossbow, fire-arms, bludgeon, or any other offensive weapon," such person shall be guilty of a misdemeanour.

Held, that a count of an indictment for a third offence against section 1 of entering by night upon land with a gun for the purpose of taking or destroying game, which shows that one of the two alleged previous convictions was a conviction of an offence against section 9, is bad, as it does not show that such person has "so" offended a third time within the meaning of section 1.—REX v. LINES, C.C.R., 303; [1902] 1 K. B. 199; 71 L. J. K. B. 125; 85 L. T. 790.

10. Larceny—Deer—Unlawful possession of—Deer "kept or being in" a forest—Deer killed outside forest—Larceny Act, 1861 (24 & 25 Vict. c. 96), ss. 12, 14.—A person who kills and carries away a deer when it has strayed outside the boundaries of a forest, chase, or purlieu, in which it is usually kept, on to the land of a third person has not "unlawfully" killed the deer within the meaning of section 12 of the Larceny Act, 1861, and cannot therefore be convicted under section 14 of being in unlawful possession thereof. — THRELKELD v. SMITH, K.B.D., 158; [1901] 1 K. B. 531; 70 L. J. K. B. 921; 85 L. T. 275.

11. Larceny—Fish taken at sea—Possession of owner of smack—Skipper of smack.—Fish taken at sea are in the possession of the owner of the smack by which they are taken, as soon as they are taken, and are consequently the subject of larceny.

A., who was employed as skipper of a smack used for trawling outside territorial waters, during the course of a fishing voyage put into port, sold the fish he had taken, and appropriated the proceeds to his own use.

Held, that he was properly convicted of larceny. —REX v. MALLISON, C.C.R.; 86 L. T. 600.

12. Larceny—Indictment—Husband and wife—Wife stealing goods of husband when about to leave or desert him—Married Women's Property Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 75), ss. 12, 16.—By sections 12 and 16 of the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, it is provided that a husband may take criminal proceedings against his wife concerning property claimed by him, if such property shall have been wrongfully taken by the wife when leaving or deserting, or about to leave or desert, her husband.

On the trial of a charge by a husband against his wife for feloniously stealing certain moneys, goods, and chattels belonging to him when she was about to leave or desert him, it is not necessary that the indictment should contain averments that she was the wife of the prosecutor, and that she had taken the articles when leaving or deserting, or about to leave or desert, her husband.—REX v. JAMES, C.C.R., 286; [1902] 1 K. B. 540; 71 L. J. K. B. 211; 86 L. T. 202.

CROWN:—

1. Commissioners of Works and Public Buildings—Contract by—Liability of commissioners—Principal and agent.—The Commissioners of His Majesty's Works and Public Buildings, who were incorporated by 37 & 38 Vict. c. 84, may be sued in an action for breach of a contract entered into by them as such commissioners.—GRAHAM v. WORKS AND PUBLIC BUILDINGS COMMISSIONERS, K.B.D., 122; [1901] 2 K. 2. Intestacy—Illegitimate foreigner—Personalty in England—Bona vacantia—Conflict of laws.—The Crown is entitled to the personal property in England left by an illegitimate unmarried foreign intestate, who was domiciled and died abroad, for the Crown takes such property, not by right of succession, but as being bona vacantia in England, and the lex domicilii does not therefore apply.—BARNETT'S TRUSTS, RE, *Ch.D. CUSTOMS:—

Customs officer—Search of ship—Obstructing officer—Reasonableness of search—Right of magistrate to judge of.—Where a person is summoned for obstructing a customs officer in execution of his duty while on board a ship for the purpose of searching the same, the magistrate has no jurisdiction to inquire into the reasonableness or unreasonableness of the search, unless he finds that the search was a mere pretence. The duty of deciding what search there shall be is imposed on the customs officer and not on the magistrate.—ANDERSON v. REID, K.B.D.; 86 L. T. 713.

DAMAGES:—

Measure of—Sale of goods—Contract to supply invert sugar for brewing—Sugar contaminated with poisonous matter—Beer destroyed.—The measure of damages, apart from special circumstances, which the manufacturer of an article that has had to be destroyed by the fault of another is entitled to recover, is the price which he could have sold it for on the day that it had to be destroyed.

Held, therefore, that although the plaintiffs were brewers they were entitled to recover the full selling value of the beer in their cellars, which had by the fault of the defendants to be thrown away, and not merely such a sum as they themselves must have expended in order to brew an equal amount of beer of the same quality to replace it.—HOLDEN (LIMITED) v. BOSTOCK & Co. DEED:—

1. Alteration—Name of party—Misdescription—Mortgage—Reconveyance—Married woman—Trustee mortgagee—Concurrence of husband—Separate acknowledgment.—Upon a sale of freehold property the abstract of title delivered to the purchaser commenced with a mortgage to three persons, of whom the third was described as "William" G. It appeared from the original deed that the name "William" had been erased, and the names "Edward Thomas" substituted. The alteration was made after execution, but it was not known when or by whom. It was proved that the person described as William G. was really Edward Thomas G., and that the misdescription was due to inadvertence.

Held, that the alteration was immaterial, and, in the absence of fraud did not avoid the deed.

The mortgage was dated in 1878 and was granted to trustees; and in 1896, upon payment of the mortgage debt, the property was reconveyed by the sole surviving trustee, who was a married woman.

Held, that under section 16 of the Trustee Act, 1893, she was competent to reconvey without the concurrence of her husband and a separate acknowledgment.—HOWGATE AND OSBORN'S CONTRACT, RE, Ch.D. Kekewich, J.; [1902] 1 Ch. 451; 71 L. J. Ch. 279; 86 L. T. 180.

2. Setting aside—Solicitor—Trustee of settlement—Subsequent variations of settlement—Surrender of rights by married woman—No independent advice.—Deeds whereby a married woman was without consideration induced to surrender rights conferred by a post-nuptial settlement set aside on the ground that the solicitor who prepared the deeds being himself a trustee thereof failed in his duty in not making the lady understand the real nature of the transaction and in not seeing that she had advice independently of her husband.—WILLIS v. BARRON, H.L.; [1902] A. DIVORCE—

1. Costs—wife's costs—Application by solicitor who had acted for wife to tax costs against respondent—No previous application for security.—A wife filed a petition for judicial separation, and the case was in due course set down for trial. Subsequently she wrote to her solicitors saying that she had returned to her husband. On the 29th of May her solicitors wrote to her expressing a wish to withdraw from the case, and they did not afterwards act for her. Up to that date they took no steps, under the prevailing practice of the Divorce Division, to obtain security for the wife's costs from the husband. On the 3rd of July they carried their costs into a registry for taxation against the husband. On a summons adjourned into court for further argument, the court held that, as the solicitors had not applied for security in the ordinary way, they must be left to their remedy at common law; that the application was not in accord with the practice of the court; that it was out of time; that it was not made by the wife's solicitors, but merely by a firm that had at one time acted for her; that the court had no jurisdiction to deal with it; and that it must be dismissed with costs against the applicants personally.—NAIRNE v. NAIRNE, P.D. & Ad.D.; 71 L. J. P. 37; 85 L. T. 649.

2. Costs—Wife's costs—No security—Disagreement of jury—Second trial — Co-respondent's costs. — A husband petitioned for a dissolution of marriage on the ground of his wife's adultery with the co-respondent. The respondent alleged that the petitioner had been guilty of cruelty and adultery, and the jury were discharged without giving a verdict, as they were not able to agree on all the issues. The wife had not applied for security for costs before the trial, and the court declined to make any order after the trial, on the ground that, as a second trial was pending, the application was premature. The wife then obtained security for her costs of the second trial. The jury at that second trial found that the respondent and co-respondent had committed adultery, and that the petitioner had committed adultery, but that it had been condoned by the respondent.

Held, that the wife was entitled to her full costs of both trials, and that the co-respondent must pay the costs of the issues on which he had failed.—WAUDBY v. WAUDBY, P.D. & Ad.D., 176; [1902] P. 85; 71 L. J. P. 43; 86 L. T. 123.

3. Costs — Wife's petition—Husband's petition—Costs against co-respondent—Costs of wife's petition—Party to proceedings—Appeal—Final order—Matrimonial Causes Act, 1857 (20 & 21 Vict. c. 85), s. 34 —Judicature Act, 1890 (53 & 54 Vict. c. 44), s. 5.—The power to order payment of costs conferred on the court by section 5 of the Judicature Act, 1890, must be confined to parties to the proceedings. The co-respondent to a petition presented by a husband does not become a party to a cross-petition presented by the wife on the making of an order for the consolidation of the two suits, as such an order is only an arrangement for the convenience of trying the two suits together and involves nothing analogous to "consolidation" at common law. A co-respondent, therefore, in such a case not being a "party to the proceedings" within section 34 of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1857, there is no jurisdiction to make him pay the costs of the wife's petition.

An order directing payment of costs is not an interlocutory order working out the final judgment, but is part of the final judgment though separated from it by an interval of some days.—FORBES-SMITH v. FORBES-SMITH, C.A., 6; [1901] P. 258; 70 L. J. P. 61; 84 L. T. 789.

4. Cruelty—Wife's petition—Adultery of husband with servants in house—Breakdown of the health of the wife.—If the conduct of the husband is such as to cause a breakdown of the health of the wife, by reason of the disgrace and shock arising out of a conviction of the husband under the Criminal Law Amendment Act, 1885 (48 & 49 Vict. c. 69), the court will hold this to constitute legal cruelty on the part of the husband, and will grant a decree nisi to the wife, the adultery having been also proved.—THOMPSON v. THOMPSON, P.D. & Ad.D.; 85 L. T. 172.

5. Damages claimed against co-respondent—Amount of damages not specified.—In a husband's petition for divorce by reason of his wife's adultery with the co-respondent, when there is a claim for damages, the amount claimed must be specified in the petition.—PEGLER v. PEGLER, P.D. & Ad.D.; 85 L. T. 649.

6. Decree nisi—Intervention of co-respondent—Decree absolute—Matrimonial Causes Act, 1880 (23 & 24 Vict. c. 144), s. 7.—A co-respondent entered an appearance in a divorce suit, but did not defend the action. A decree nisi was obtained by the petitioner. It was held by the court that the co-respondent could not afterwards intervene to show cause why the decree should not be made absolute.—HARRIES v. HARRIES, P.D. & Ad.D.; 86 L. T. 262.

7. Desertion—"Reasonable excuse"—Refusal of wife to allow marital intercourse—Matrimonial Causes Act, 1857 (20 & 21 Vict. c. 85), s. 27.—After a husband and wife had been for some years living apart by (as the court held) mutual consent, the husband committed adultery.

Held, that this was not evidence of desertion by him.

A wife who without cause refuses to permit marital intercourse to her husband cannot allege "desertion" by him "without reasonable excuse" if in consequence he refuses to live with her.

Decision of Jeune, P., [1900] P. 180, affirmed.—SYNGE v. SYNGE, C.A.; [1901] P. 317; 70 L. J. P. 97; 85 L. T. 83.

8. Judicial separation—Wife's petition—Husband's desertion and adultery—Custody of children—Guardianship of Infants Act, 1886 (49 & 50 Vict. c. 27), s. 7.—Upon a wife's petition for judicial separation on the ground of her husband's desertion and adultery, the court will require very strong evidence of the aggravated character of the conduct of the husband before making an order, under section 7 of the Guardianship of Infants Act, 1886, that he is a person unfit to have the custody of his children.

9. Maintenance—Permanent maintenance—Matrimonial Causes Act, 1857 (20 & 21 Vict. c. 85), s. 32—Gross sum—Payment to petitioner.—The court ordered a gross sum of money to be paid to a petitioner by way of permanent maintenance.—KIRK v. KIRK, P.D. & Ad.D.; [1902] P. 145; 71 L. J. P. 78.

10. Nullity—Decree nisi—Intervention by King's Proctor—Motion by petitioner to rescind decree and dismiss petition—Costs—Consent—Motion granted.—Upon the petitioner's application—the King's Proctor, who had intervened and filed his plea, assenting—the court (Jeune, P.) rescinded a decree nisi for nullity of marriage and dismissed the petition.

No order for the King's Proctor's costs was made, he having waived his right to ask for the same.—A. v. A., P.D. & Ad.D.; [1901] P. 284; 70 L. J. P. 90; 85 L. T. 171.

11. Nullity—Domicil—Matrimonial residence—Jurisdiction.—In suits for nullity of marriage the true test of jurisdiction is the matrimonial residence as distinguished from domicil, which is the test in suits for dissolution.—BRENNAN (OTHERWISE ROBERTS v. BRENNAN, P.D. & Ad.D., 414; [1902] P. 143; 71 L. J. P. 74; 86 L. T. 599.

12. Nullity—Frigidity—Refusal to allow intercourse—Six months' cohabitation—Variation of settlements.—Where the respondent resisted all attempts at intercourse for a period of six months,

The court annulled the marriage and varied the marriage settlement, ordering the respondent to pay an annual sum to the petitioner.—E. v. E. (OTHERWISE T.), P.D. & Ad.D., 607.

13. Practice—Costs—Co-respondent.—Where, upon an application to make a co-respondent liable for the costs of a petition, the only proof of scienter was an admission by him that within a fortnight after he first committed adultery with the respondent he became aware that she was a married woman,

Held, that the petitioner was entitled to an order for costs against the co-respondent.—BILBY v. BILBY AND HARROP, P.D. & Ad.D.; [1902] P. 8; 71 L. J. P. 31; 86 L. T. 123.

14. Practice—Evidence de bene esse—Application for commission—Costs—Petition filed but not served.—An order for a commission to take the evidence of witnesses out of the jurisdiction was made, at the risk and expense of the applicant, immediately after the petition had been filed and before there had been time to effect service.—VALLENTINE v. VALLENTINE, P.D. & Ad.D.; [1901] P. 283; 70 L. J. P. 89; 85 L. T. 171.

15. Practice—Particulars of adultery.—Under an order to give further and better particulars of the dates and places when and where alleged acts of adultery extending over ten months were committed, the petitioner must give the best particulars which he can extract from the witnesses upon whom he relies to prove his case. It is not a sufficient compliance with such an order to allege generally that the respondent and co-respondent were constantly meeting, and were in the respondent's boudoir and bedroom together, and that they were frequently out riding and driving alone together, from which the court will be asked to infer that they committed adultery.—HARTOPP v. HARTOPP, C.A.; 71 L. J. P. 78.

16. Practice — Particulars — Witnesses, names of probable—Order for disclosure.—Where in a petition by the wife against the husband he was, for the purpose of establishing cruelty, charged with using insulting language to her in the presence of servants and guests, with the object of humiliating and degrading her, the petitioner was ordered to give particulars, setting forth the names of such servants and guests.—BISHOP v. BISHOP, P.D. & Ad.D.; [1901] P. 325; 70 L. J. P. 93; 85 L. T. 173.

17. Rape—Indecent assault—Conduct amounting to cruelty.—Where in a suit for dissolution of marriage on the ground of rape the respondent was proved to have been convicted at the quarter sessions of a series of indecent assaults upon children,

The court granted the petitioner a decree nisi on the ground of the respondent's having committed rape;

And held further, that such conduct of the respondent, causing nervous shock to the petitioner, amounted to cruelty.

Thompson v. Thompson, 17 Times L R. 572, and Coffey v. Coffey, [1898] P. 169, 46 W. R. Dig. 51, followed.—BOSWORTHICK v. BOSWORTHICK P.D & Ad D., 217; 86 L. T. 121.

18. Restitution of conjugal rights — Custody of children—Practice—Interim order.—The court has power, under section 6 of 47 & 48 Vict. c. 68, to make an interim order as to custody of the children of the marriage, and to save expense will make such an order at the time of the pronouncing of a decree of restitution of conjugal rights.—PAINE v. PAINE, P.D. & Ad.D., 382.

19. Restitution of conjugal rights—Form of written demand before institution of proceedings—Practice—Divorce Court Rules, 1866, r. 2—Additional Rules and Regulations, 1869, r. 175.—Upon an undefended petition by the wife for restitution of conjugal rights, the preliminary letter, put forward as in accordance with the rules, was in the terms following:

"I write to you to express my desire to cohabit and live you as your wife, and to require from you a full restitution of the conjugal rights of which you have deprived me for now over a year."

The President: This letter is not quite in the usual form. The word "require" is rather peremptory, and might possibly be taken exception to as not being within the judgments of the Court of Appeal: Field v. Field, (1889) 14 P. D. 26; Smith v Smith, (1890) 15 P. D. 47. In my view, however, it is not reasonable to expect a woman to write affectionate letters to her husband under circumstances such as are usually shown to have existed in this class of cases. All that ought to be required is that a clear request should be shown to have been made, received, and not complied with. I shall allow this letter to pass as a sufficient compliance with the rule, and there will be the usual decree.—ELLIOTT v. ELLIOTT, P.D. & Ad.D.; 85 L. T. 648.

20. Return of wife to cohabitation—Suit pending—Application of solicitor as to costs of suit—Reserved list.—If the parties return to cohabitation whilst a matrimonial suit is pending, the petition will not necessarily be struck out of the list for want of prosecution whilst the costs of the petitioner's solicitor are unpaid. The proper course is for the case to be put into the reserved list.—WARWICK v. WARWICK, P.D. & Ad.D.; 85 L. T. 173.

21. Variation of settlements—Jurisdiction to entertain—Petition by guilty party.—Semble, the court has power to entertain a petition for variation of settlements at the instance of the party through whose misconduct the marriage has been dissolved.

If a wife is in receipt of an allowance derived from funds settled by the husband, and if out of that allowance she keeps up their joint establishment, the husband is not entitled to a reduction of the wife's allowance after she has obtained a divorce by reason of his cruelty and adultery.—WOOTTON-ISAACSON v. WOOTTON-ISAACSON, P.D. & Ad.D.; [1902] P. 146; 71 L. J. P. 80.

22. Variation of settlements—Policy payable at fixed date to husband if alive, and if not to wife—Matrimonial Clauses Act, 1857 (20 & 21 Vict. c. 85), s. 45—Matrimonial Clauses Act, 1859 (22 & 23 Vict. c. 61), s. 5.—Where a wife had certain rights under a policy on her husband's life, and the marriage was afterwards dissolved by reason of her adultery,

The court ordered her to settle her interests thereunder for the benefit of the petitioner and the children of the marriage.—STEDALL v. STEDALL, P.D. & Ad.D., 320; 86 L. T. 124.

23. Variation of settlements—Principle of quid pro quo—Power of appointment upon petitioner's second marriage—Children's reversionary interests affected—Extinguishment of respondent's interests—Matrimonial Clauses Act, 1859 (22 & 23 Vict. c. 61), s. 5.—The court has power to vary a marriage settlement so as to deprive infant children of the marriage of part of their interests secured to them by such settlement.

Where a marriage settlement gave the petitioner (wife) power to appoint, after the death of the respondent, in favour of a second husband and the children of a second marriage, the court, recognizing the principle of quid pro quo in such cases, gave to the petitioner power so to appoint, during the respondent's lifetime, a portion of the fund which had been settled for the ultimate benefit of the children of the marriage, upon the ground that the extinguishment of the respondent's interests being part of the order would, while depriving them of that portion, accelerate their interests in the remainder.—WHITTON v. WHITTON, P.D. & Ad.D; [1901] P. 348; 71 L. J. P. 10; 85 L. T. 646.

24. Variation of settlement—Settled property wholly brought in by husband—Extinction of husband's life interest—Matrimonial Causes Act, 1859, s. 5.—After a divorce on the wife's petition the court extinguished the husband's life interest in the property included in the marriage settlement, the income of which amounted to £45 a year, and the whole of which had been brought into settlement by him. There was one child of the marriage, who had not attained a vested interest.

Held, that this was a proper exercise of the discretion of the court in the interests of the wife and child.—KAYE v. KAYE, C.A., 499; 86 L. T. 638.

25. Variation of settlement—Vested interest of child—Settled property—Extinguishment of rights of guilty party—Matrimonial Causes Act, 1859 (21 & 22 Vict. c. 61), s. 5.—By a marriage settlement property of the wife was settled upon trusts for the wife for life, then for her husband if he survived her, with remainder to the children of the marriage. There was one child of the marriage, who attained twenty-one, and died a bachelor and intestate, the beneficial interest which he had acquired in the property on attaining twenty-one passing to his father as sole next-of-kin. Subsequently to the death of this child the wife obtained a divorce from her husband.

Held, that the property was settled property within section 5 of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1859, and that the court would, under the jurisdiction conferred by that section, vary the settlement by extinguishing all the rights, powers, and interests of the husband thereunder, including any beneficial derivative interest which he took as next-of kin of his deceased son.

DOMICIL:—

Renunciation of domicil of origin—Acquisition of domicil of choice—Evidence—Presumption—The testator, whose domicil of origin was the United States of America, went for trade purposes to live in Russia, from which country he yearly paid visits to England. Afterwards, being advised by his doctors, on account of his bad health, not to live in Russia, he came to England, and took a house at Brighton. For a few years he paid visits to Russia, but on giving up his trade connections he ceased to do this. For the last twenty-seven years of his life he lived in Great Britain, having leases of houses in London and Brighton, and spending the shooting season in Scotland, where he rented deer forests. He also used to go for his health's sake to visit a watering-place in Germany. While living in England he bought an estate in the United States, apparently for the purpose of selling it again as a speculation, but he had no residence in America during the period for which he lived in Great Britain. He described himself in certain American documents as an American citizen sojourning in England. He was advised by his doctors that a voyage to America would be dangerous in his state of health, but he sometimes expressed an intention of returning to America in a vessel which he invented, and took out patents for, which was intended not to roll or pitch when at sea.

Held, upon the evidence before the court, that there was an unrebutted presumption in favour of the testator having abandoned his domicil of origin and acquired a domicil of choice in Great Britain.—ATTORNEY-GENERAL v. WINANS, C.A.; 85 L. T. 508.

DONATIO MORTIS CAUSA:—

1. Delivery of a cheque accompanied by a written request that a third party shall pay same to donee after decease of donor—Gift declared invalid.—An invalid lady with the help of a friend sent three cheques, each for the sum of £100, made out to three different persons, to another friend of hers with a letter couched in the following terms: "Miss Davis wishes me to send you the three inclosed cheques for you to keep for her, and in case of her death, and then see the said persons have the money, &c." Miss D. died upon the following day.

Upon an originating summons taken out by the executor to ascertain whether he was justified in paying the three sums of £100,

Held, that there had been no valid donatio mortis causâ, and that the executor was not at liberty to honour the cheques.—DAVIS, RE, GRIFFITH v. DAVIS, Ch.D. Farwell, J.; 86 L. T. 889.

2. Donor's cheque—Cheque presented but not paid in donor's lifetime.—The delivery of a donor's own cheque to a donee does not operate as an equitable assignment to the donee of any part of the donor's balance at the bank. Consequently, if the cheque be not paid, actually or constructively, before the donor's death, there can be no donatio mortis causâ of such cheque; where the donor's account is in debit, even though the banker is willing to honour an overdraft, the mere presentation of the cheque does not amount to a constructive payment.

3. Post Office Savings Bank deposit book—Certificate of Local Loans 3 per Cent. Stock—Validity.—A. was possessed of a certain sum in the Post Office Savings Bank and a sum of £50 10s. Local Loans 3 per Cent. Stock. Three days before her death, being well aware that her death was imminent, she expressed a desire that her sister should, in the event of her death, have all the money in the savings bank and the sum of £50 10s. Local Loans 3 per Cent. Stock. She accordingly delivered to her sister a desk containing the savings bank deposit book and the certificate of the Local Loans Stock, and gave her also the key of the desk.

Held, that the gift of the money in the savings bank was a proper subject for a donatio mortis causâ, and therefore valid, but that the gift of the Local Loans Stock was not, and was therefore invalid.—ANDREWS, RE, ANDREWS v. ANDREWS, Ch.D. Kekewich, J., 569.

EASEMENT:—

1. Light—Ancient lights—Consent or agreement—Prescription Act (2 & 3 Will. 4), s. 3.—In 1873 E., the owner and occupier of an hotel, erected on the northern side of his premises a conservatory adjoining the defendant's property, and entered into an agreement, dated the 13th of July, 1873, with the defendant's predecessor in title, whereby E. agreed to pay 1s. a year to the defendant's predecessor for allowing "the window" of his conservatory to overlook and open on to the defendant's property. The sloping top of the conservatory was of glazed glass, as also was the whole of the vertical side adjoining the defendant's property above a few feet from the ground. Portions of the glazed side of the conservatory were movable, so that, when opened, they overhung the defendant's property. The yearly rent was duly paid until 1888, when the conservatory was converted into a passage or corridor of the hotel, the sloping top of the conservatory being retained in its former position and by means of its glazed glass giving light to the hotel corridor, and forming the roof to the corridor. The defendant erected certain buildings which obstructed the access of light to the hotel corridor through the glazed roof; and the plaintiff, E.'s successor, brought an action for an injunction and damages.

Held, that the agreement of the 13th of July, 1873, referred to the sloping roof of the conservatory as well as the vertical side.

Held, also, that E. and his successor, the plaintiff, enjoyed the light only by virtue of the said agreement, which was a consent or agreement within the meaning of section 3 of the Prescription Act, and therefore that the plaintiff's action failed. —EASTON v. ISTED, Ch.D. Joyce, J., 472; 71 L. J. Ch. 442; 86 L T 442.

2. Light—Building estate—Deviations from building agreement—Implied grant of light—Derogation from grant—Conveyancing Act, 1881, s. 6 (2).—The grantee of a house with the lights under the words imported into the grant by the Conveyancing Act, 1881, s. 6 (2), is only entitled to such an easement of light as is consistent with the intention of the parties to be implied from the circumstances existing at the time of the grant and known to the grantee.

O. entered into a building agreement with S., a builder, a plan on the usual lines being attached to the agreement with the sites of the proposed buildings plotted out upon it. S., having built some of the houses in accordance with the agreement, with the assent of O., built upon certain of the remaining plots a block of mansions not in accordance with the building scheme. S. constructed the mansions with a party-wall, one-half of which was upon the adjoining plot, his intention being to add a corresponding block upon the adjoining plots. This intention was never carried into effect. The plots on which the first block had been erected were conveyed by O. to S. in fee simple, the conveyance containing no express grant of light. S. the next day mortgaged the premises to X., who had full knowledge of the building agreement and of the manner in which the mansions had been erected. O. subsequently sold the plots adjoining the party-wall to S., who in turn conveyed the some to the defendants. X. subsequently sold the block of mansions, under his power of sale, to O., who made a settlement of the property, under which he was himself interested.

On an action being brought by the trustees of the settlement to restrain the defendants from building in such a manner as to obstruct the lights of the mansions.

Held, that the plaintiffs were not entitled under the Conveyancing Act, 1881, s. 6 (2), to any greater easement of light than such modified easement as was contemplated by O. and S. at the time when the block of mansions was erected.

3. Light—Prescription—Extent of right—Light for ordinary purposes—Substantial interference—Substantial damage—Rule as to 45 degrees.—If ancient lights are interfered with substantially and real damage thereby ensues to tenant or owner, then that tenant or owner is entitled to relief. "Substantial" does not indicate any particular percentage.

Without substantial interference there is no right of action, and in addition, in order to obtain an injunction, the plaintiff must establish substantial injury suffered or threatened. There is no standard or fixed amount of light to which alone a plaintiff is entitled.

There may be real damage to the owner or occupier of a building used for particular purposes, or reasonably adapted for particular purposes, although there would be no real damage if the building were not used or reasonably adapted for such purposes.

There is no rule of law that a man may always build up to an angle of 45 degrees.—HOME AND COLONIAL STORES v. COLLS, C.A., 227; [1902] 1 Ch. 302; 71 L. J. Ch. 146; 85 L. T. 701.

4. Light—Prescription—Extent of right—Light for ordinary purposes — Trade requiring extraordinary degree of light.—There is no standard of light. In considering whether ancient lights have been substantially interfered with, regard must be had to the ordinary uses by way of habitation or business to which the house has been put or might reasonably be supposed to be capable of being put.

A plaintiff is therefore entitled to relief where his extraordinary amount of light has been substantially interfered with, even though sufficient light is left for ordinary purposes.

5. Light—Prescription—Purposes requiring special quantity of light—Abandonment—Mandatory injunction.—Although less than twenty years have elapsed since an ancient light has been used for a business requiring a special quantity of light, and although such business could not have been carried but for the enlargement of the ancient light, which enlargement was made within that period,

Held, nevertheless, that the light, so far as ancient, must not be substantially interfered with, and that the court would take into consideration the nature of the business.

6. Right of way—Alleged extinguishment and partial abandonment—Obstruction—Mandatory injunction to remove obstruction refused.—The plaintiffs, as owners of certain lands situate in the borough of Croydon, known as Whitehorse-lane, had a right of way over a strip of land ten feet wide on adjoining property in the occupation of the defendants. Some years before action brought, the plaintiffs erected a summer-house which projected over the strip of land to the extent of 2ft. 4in. Before action brought, the defendants erected and eight months prior to the date of the writ they completed the erection of a stable on the strip of land, which obstructed the plaintiff's right of way. The plaintiffs brought an action—first, for a declaration that they were entitled to the right of way; secondly, an order requiring the defendants to remove the buildings in question; thirdly, for an injunction to restrain the defendants, their servants and agents, from obstructing the plaintiffs and their tenants, and the agents of the plaintiffs and their tenants, in the exercise of such right of way. The defendants pleaded extinguishment or abandonment before action brought.

Held, first, on the facts, that the plaintiffs had proved their title to and had not abandoned or extinguished their right of way; secondly, that partial abandonment, by the erection of a summer-house projecting across a portion of the strip of land was not, in the circumstances, sufficient evidence of abandonment; that the plaintiffs were entitled to an injunction and 40s. damages, but that, owing to the fact that the defendants' obstructing building had been completed eight months before action, an order for its removal could not be made.—YOUNG v. STAR OMNIBUS CO., Ch.D. Farwell, J.; 86 L. T. 41.

7. Right of way—Licensees of grantee—Reasonable user.—A grant of a right of way to premises which may lawfully be used for a given purpose authorizes the use of the way in question in any reasonable manner by all persons lawfully going to or from such premises in pursuance of such purpose, whether such persons be mentioned in the grant or not.—BAXENDALE v. NORTH LAMBETH LIBERAL CLUB, *Ch.D. 1. Consistory court—Jurisdiction of bishop—Jurisdiction of chancellor—Patent appointing chancellor—Reservation to bishop of certain causes—Validity of reservation—Prohibition.—Letters patent granted by a bishop, appointing an official principal and vicar-general, and conferring on him power to determine suits in the consistory court, contained the following reservation: "Nevertheless first consulting us and our successors, and having our consent in case either party earnestly crave our judgment."

Held, that the reservation was valid, and that prohibition lay to the official principal to prohibit him from proceeding without the bishop's consent in a suit in which one of the parties earnestly craved the bishop's judgment.

3. Judicial separation from wife—Persistent cruelty—Vicar deprived of his preferment by bishop—Validity of bishop's declaration—Matrimonial Causes Act, 1878 (41 & 42 Vict. c. 19). s. 4—Clergy Discipline Act, 1892 (55 & 56 Vict. c. 32), s 1, sub-section 1 (d) (e)—Summary Jurisdiction (Married Women) Act, 1895 (58 & 59 Vict. c. 39), s. 12—Interpretation Act, 1889 (52 & 53 Vict c. 63), s. 38.—A separation order under the Summary Jurisdiction (Married Women) Act, 1895, was made against the vicar of C. by justices at petty sessions upon the ground of his persistent cruelty to his wife. Upon the order becoming conclusive, the bishop of the diocese declared the living of C. vacant, purporting to act under section 1 of the Clergy Discipline Act, 1892.

Held, that the bishop's declaration was invalid.

A clergyman cannot be deprived of his living by reason only of a separation order, based upon persistent cruelty, being made against him.

4. Mandamus—Confirmation of bishop-elect by Archbishop or Vicar-General—Objections as to doctrine—25 Hen. 8. c. 20.—There is no jurisdiction in the Archbishop of Canterbury or his Vicar-General to entertain, upon the confirmation of the election of a bishop-elect, objections raised to such confirmation alleging ecclesiastical offences—the contravention of the articles of religion by the publication of false doctrine, want of prudence and discretion, and unfitness to fill the office of a bishop.

3. Registration—Parliamentary franchise—Parochial relief—Medical relief—Maintenance of voter's wife as pauper lunatic—Disqualification—

Representation of the People Act, 1832 (2 Will. 4, c. 45), s. 36—Medical Relief Disqualification Removal Act. 1885 (48 & 49 Vict. c. 46).—In all cases in which relief is given, partaking more or less of the nature both of medical relief and of ordinary relief, it is a question of fact for the revising barrister to decide what is the real character of the relief.

The appellant claimed to have his name inserted in Division I. of the occupiers' list of voters; he was qualified in all respects except for the fact that his wife had, during the whole of the qualifying period, and for nine months previously to that period, been maintained out of the poor rates in the county lunatic asylum, the appellant contributing nothing towards her maintenance. The revising barrister, in these circumstances, held that the maintenance of the appellant's wife was not "medical assistance" within the meaning of that expression in the Medical Relief Disqualification Removal Act, 1885, and that the appellant was disqualified by virtue of section 36 of the Representation of the People Act, 1832.

The court affirmed the barrister's decision.—KIRKHOUSE v. BLAKEWAY, K.B D., 206; [1902] 1 K. B 306; 71 L. J. K. B. 130; 86 L. T. 19.

ELECTRIC LIGHTING ACTS:—

Arrears due to electric supply corporation—Receiver—Occupier—Electric Lighting Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 56), s. 19—Electric Lighting Orders Confirmation (No. 2) Act, 1889 (52 & 53 Vict. c. 178), Schedule, clause 47.—A hotel company contracted with an electric lighting company for a supply of electricity to the hotel. A receiver and manager was appointed of the property of the hotel company by an order in a debenture-holders' action. The receiver entered into possession of the premises. At the time the receiver entered into possession the hotel company was indebted to the electric lighting company for electricity supplied, and the latter company threatened to discontinue the supply unless the arrears due to them were paid. The receiver brought an action for an injunction to restrain the company from cutting off the supply.

Held, that, assuming in the receiver's favour that he was a new occupier of the premises, still he had no right to a supply under the Electric Lighting Acts till he had entered into a new contract with the electric lighting company, and that the motive of the electric lighting company in demanding a contract could not affect their statutory rights. On the other hand, if he claimed under the contract with the hotel company he was bound to discharge the arrears.

The injunction was accordingly refused.—HUSEY v. LONDON ELECTRIC SUPPLY CORPORATION, C.A., 420; [1902] 1 Ch. 411; 71 L. J. Ch. 313; 86 L. T. 166.

FACTORY:—

1. Master and servant—Self-acting machine—Safety—Employment of "young person"—Factory and Workship Act, 1895 (58 & 59 Vict. c. 37), s. 9, sub-section 2.—Section 9, sub-section 2, of the Factory and Workshop Act, 1895, provides that "a person employed in a factory shall not be allowed to be in the space between the fixed and traversing portions of a self-acting machine unless the machine is stopped, with the traversing portion on the outward run. . . ."

A boy, a "young person" within the meaning of the Factory and Workshop Act, 1878, was employed in a factory by a man who was in the employment of the respondents, the occupiers of the factory, and who was in charge of a self-acting machine. This man ordered the boy to clean a certain part of the machine, and in order to do so the boy was obliged to be in the space between the fixed and the traversing portions of the machine. At the time the order was given the traversing portion of the machine was stopped on the outward run. While the boy was still in the said space the man in charge, thinking the boy was clear of such space, re-started the machine, whereby the boy received injuries from which he died.

Held, that, as the man when he re-started the machine thought that the boy was clear of the space, the boy was not at the time of the accident "allowed" to be within the space by the occupiers of the factory or by any person for whom they were responsible.

The court could not interpret the words "shall not be allowed" in sub-section 2 of section 9 as meaning "shall be prevented."—CRABTREE v. FERN SPINNING CO., K.B.D., 167; 85 L. T. 549.

Held, that the word "ought" was not to be construed as a word of legal liability, the Legislature intending to insure the safety of the factory and to leave it to the county court judge to do what was right between the parties.—MONK v. ARNOLD, K.B.D., 667; [1902] 1 K. The mesh of the net was smaller than that allowed by the bye-laws.

Held, that, provided the justices found intention, there was evidence of fishing for salmon otherwise than by rod and line during the weekly close time, and of attempting to take salmon with smaller meshes than that allowed by the bye-laws.—DAVIES v. EVANS, K.B.D.; 86 L. T. 419.

A municipal corporation who have obtained from the Board of Trade an order for the regulation of the oyster fishery in their harbour, which order has been confirmed by Act of Parliament, may, under section 41 of the Sea Fisheries Act, 1868, take a short lease of the foreshore for the purpose of carrying out the objects of their Act, and such lease is not rendered invalid either by the Mortmain Act, 1888, or by section 107 of the Municipal Corporations Act, 1882.—TRURO (CORPORATION) v. ROWE, K.B.D., 151; [1901] 2 K. GAMING:—

1. Betting slips—Horse-races—Wagering on a game of chance—Vagrancy Act, 1824 (5 Geo. 4, c. 83)—Vagrant Act Amendment Act, 1873 (36 & 37 Vict. c. 38, s. 3.—The appellant was charged and convicted under the Vagrancy Acts of unlawful betting by way of wagering in a public place. It was proved that several persons had on the day of the charge handed him sums of money and slips of paper with the names of the horses and the amount of their bets written thereon, and that the appellant accepted the money and placed the slips of paper in his pocket, and that he did not remain standing in one place in the recreation ground, but walked about within certain limits.

Held, quashing the conviction, that the slips of paper were not tokens of gaming within the statute, nor was the betting in respect of a game of chance.—LESTER v. QUESTED, K.B.D., 207; 85 L. T. 487.

2. Betting—Office used for betting—Coupons for prizes for naming winners of horse-races issued from office in London—Money received in Holland—Betting Act, 1853 (16 & 17 Vict. c 119), ss. 1, 3, 4.—Coupons were issued in connection with a newspaper from an office in London kept by the appellant. The coupons, which could be obtained on application free of charge were to be filled in by the competitors in a wagering competition, and when so filled in were to be sent in postal orders to an office in Holland. These postal orders were not payable in Holland, and had to be returned to England to be cashed. The money so sent in by competitors was eventually received by the appellant.

Held, that an offence had been committed under section 1 of the Betting Act, 1853, notwithstanding that the money was received from the competitors abroad, and that the appellant had been rightly convicted.—STODDART v. HAWKE, K.B.D., 93; [1902] 1 K. B. 353; 71 L. J. K. B. 133; 85 L. T. 687.

3. Coupon competition—Money paid in respect of a wagering contract and received by a person keeping a betting-house—Right to recover money so paid—Gaming Act, 1845 (8 & 9 Vict. c. 109), s. 18—Betting Act, 1853 (16 & 17 Vict. c. 119), s. 5—Gaming Act, 1892 (55 & 56 Vict. c. 9), s. 1.—Section 1 of the Gaming Act, 1892, which provides that no action shall be brought or maintained to recover money paid in respect of any contract or agreement rendered null and void by 8 & 9 Vict. c. 109, does not impliedly repeal section 5 of the Betting Act, 1853, which provides that any money received by any person, being the owner or occupier of a betting-house, as a deposit on a bet shall be deemed to have been received to or for the use of the person from whom the same was received, and such money may be recovered in any court of competent jurisdiction; and therefore a person who has paid money in a coupon competition in respect of horse-races may, under section 5 of the Act of 1853, maintain an action for the recovery of such money.—DAVIS v. STODDART, K B.D., 397; [1902] 2 K. B. 21.

4. Coupon competition—Office used for making bets or wagers—Information with respect to bets or wagers—Publishing advertisement of office.—Any person publishing an advertisement whereby it is made to appear that an office is used for the purpose of a coupon competition, being a scheme whereby money is received as the consideration for a promise to pay money on the event of a football match, is liable to the penalty mentioned in section 7 of the Betting Act, 1853. Any person publishing an advertisement whereby it is made to appear that any person will on application give information or advice with respect to a coupon competition, being a scheme whereby, through the medium of an office, money is received as the consideration for a promise to pay money on the event of a football match, is liable to the penalty mentioned in section 3 of the Betting Act, 1874.—HAWKE v. MACKENZIE (No. 1); HAWKE v. MACKENZIE (No. 2), K.B.D.; [1902] 2 K. B. 225; 71 L. J. K. B. 565.

5. Knowingly and wilfully permitting office to be used for gaming purposes—Coupon competition abroad—Advertisement in newspaper—Office of newspaper—Registered proprietor.—The manager of a football coupon competition being a means of receiving money as the consideration for a promise to pay money on the event of football matches, as an essential part of his scheme published in a newspaper an advertisement of prizes offered to and the rules to be observed and amounts to be paid by intending competitors, who were directed to fill in coupon sheets or forms appended to the advertisement, and to send them, with the amounts payable, to an address in Holland. He also published in the same newspaper lists of the prize-winners in previous competitions. The office of the newspaper was opened and kept for the purpose of the competition.

Held, that there was evidence that the manager of the competition was a person using the office of the newspaper for the purpose of money being received by him as the consideration of a promise to pay money on the event of a game within the meaning of section 1 of the Betting Act, 1853; and that the registered proprietor of the newspaper was a person knowingly and wilfully permitting the office to be used as aforesaid within the meaning of section 3 of that Act.—MACKENZIE v. HAWKE, K.B.D.; [1902] 2 K. B. 216; 71 L. J. K. B. 561.

GAVELKIND:

GUARANTEE:—

Indemnity—Promise to answer for debt or default of another—Verbal promise—Statute of Frauds (29 Car. 2, c. 3), s. 4.—Where there is a main contract, the object of which is not to answer for the debt or default of another, such a contract is not within section 4 of the Statute of Frauds, even though incidentally it may involve a liability to answer for the debt of another. But where the object of a contract is to answer for the debt of another, the contract is not taken out of the statute by the fact that the person making it incidentally gains a personal advantage, and that such personal advantage was his motive in making the contract. Accordingly, where a director of, and a large shareholder in, a company verbally promised a judgment creditor of the company to give bills for the amount of the debt due to him in consideration of his refraining from levying execution on the company's goods, Held, that the promise was a promise to answer for the company's debt within the Statute of Frauds, and must therefore be in writing.—HARBURG INDIA RUBBER COMB CO. v. MARTIN, C.A., 449; [1902] 1 K. B. 778; 71 L. J. K. B. 529; 86 L. T. 505.

HAWKER:—

Taking round sewing machines—Offer for sale to persons who had not previously requested agent to call—Hawkers Act, 1888 (51 & 52 Vict. c. 33), ss. 2, 6.—A person who carries about from place, or to other men's houses, by means of a horse and cart, unsold goods and offers them on approval for the purpose of sale is a hawker within the meaning of section 2 of the Hawkers Act, 1888, and the fact that the goods had been shown only to persons of whom it had been ascertained by means of a canvasser that they would like to see them, and would probably be purchasers, does not prevent the person showing them from being a hawker within the meaning of the statute.—HOLLAND v. HALL, K.B.D., 525.

HIGHWAY:—

1. Bridge over canal—Raised approaches to bridge—Liability to repair fences.—A canal company liable to repair bridges and the "wing walls, ramparts, and side banks thereof," but not liable to repair "roads approaching bridges" beyond the extremity of the wing walls thereof, is not liable to repair the fences to the raised approaches to bridges.—ATTORNEY-GENERAL v. OXFORD CANAL NAVIGATION, Ch.D. Kekewich J.; 71 L. J. Ch. 660.

2. Drain—Power of highway authority to keep open drain—Pipe conveying water from highway on to adjoining land—Proper outlet—Long user—Highway Act, 1835 (5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 50), s. 67.—The defendant was the owner of land adjoining a highway at a place where the highway had an upward gradient in each direction. At the lowest point of the road there had been for many years a catch-pit, into which the rain-water which fell on the road found its way, and from which it passed through a pipe about six feet long, from whence it flowed, not in any defined channel, over the surface of the defendant's land. The defendant having stopped up the pipe, the rural district council, as the highway authority, brought an action for an injunction to restrain him from continuing the obstruction.

Held, that the pipe was such a drain as was contemplated by section 67 of the Highway Act, 1835, and that after user for many years the court ought to presume that it had been made under the power given by that section; and that therefore the plaintiffs were entitled to an injunction.

3. Locomotive — Motor-car — Excessive speed — Driven "to the common danger of passengers"—Locomotives on Highways Act, 1896 (59 & 60 Vict. c. 36), s. 4—Light Locomotives on Highways Order, 1896, Art. IV., s. 1.—Article IV., section 1, of the Light Locomotives on Highways Order, 1896, provides that a person shall not drive a light locomotive on a highway at any greater speed than is reasonable and proper, having regard to the traffic on the highway.

The appellant drove a motor-car at a high rate of speed through a village. The justices convicted the appellant under the above section of the order, on the ground that the speed was "to the common danger of the passengers" using the road, although there was no evidence that anybody was on the road at the time in question.

Held, that the justices were right in convicting the appellant.—MAYHEW v. SUTTON, K.B.D., 216; 71 L. J. K. B. 46; 86 L. T. 18.

4. Power to dedicate—Land vested in company for statutory purposes — Canal company — Reservoir embankments.—A statutory body cannot dedicate to the public a right of way which would be incompatible with the special purpose for which it was incorporated.

So a canal company, which was empowered and obliged to make a canal and the works incident and necessary for the purpose of making and maintaining the canal, was to held have been incapable of dedicating to the public a right of way over the embankment of reservoirs constructed by or in pursuance of its powers in a case where it was subsequently proved that the user by the public of the right of way must ultimately lead to the destruction of the embankment and consequent damage to the public unless great expense was incurred by the company to prevent such a result.

5. Public footpath—Land appropriated as a private carriage-way—Extent of dedication—Presumption.—Where there is a public right of footway across land, and a certain amount of the surface of the land lying alongside the course of the public footpath has been devoted to traffic, although only private traffic, then primâ facie the owner of the soil must be taken to have dedicated to the public so much of the surface as he has in point of fact devoted to traffic, even although only to private traffic.

The owners of a rectangular piece of land ending at the River Mole, along which there ran a public footway, entering at the south-east corner and leading out at the north-west corner to a footbridge over the river, had appropriated the land for a private carriage-way. They take no steps to prevent the public who were using the footway going over any part of the land they pleased, although they (the owners) subsequently exercised certain acts of ownership over it.

Held, that it would be presumed that the whole of the land had been dedicated to the public for the purposes of the footway, and that the subsequent acts of ownership were not sufficient to rebut that presumption. — ATTORNEY-GENERAL v. ESHER LINOLEUM CO., Ch.D. Buckley, J., 22; [1901] 2 Ch. 647; 70 L. J. Ch. 808; 85 L. T. 414.

6. Repairs—Excessive weight—Extraordinary traffic —"Person by whose order"—"By or in consequence of whose order"—Highway and Locomotives (Amendment) Act, 1878 (41 & 42 Vict. c. 77), s. 23—Locomotives Act, 1898 (61 & 62 Vict. c. 29), s. 12. —The defendant, being about to build a house in the plaintiffs' district, entered into a contract with a brick company for the delivery of a large number of bricks on the land where he intended building, but he gave no order as to the manner or time in which such bricks were to be delivered. The brick company, in the defendant's absence abroad, and without his knowledge, caused the bricks to be delivered by means of traction engines and trucks, the excessive weight of which caused damage to certain of the plaintiffs' roads, and they in consequence brought an action in the county court againt the defendant to recover the amount of the expenses to which they had been put in repairing the roads. The county court judge, under the circumstances, came to the conclusion that the defendant was not a person "by or in consequence of whose order" such excessive weight had been conducted over the plaintiffs' roads within the meaning of section 23 of the Highways and Locomotives (Amendment) Act, 1878, as amended by section 12, sub-section 1 (c), of the Locomotives Act, 1898, and that he was therefore not liable.

Held, that, under the circumstances of the case, and in view of the facts, the learned county court judge was not wrong in arriving at the conclusion he had come to.—EGHAM RURAL DISTRICT COUNCIL v. GORDON, K.B.D., 703; [1902] 2 K. B. 120; 71 L. J. K. B. 523.

7. Repairs—Local government—Expenses—Justices —Wakefield Corporation Act, 1887, ss. 28-31—Private Street Works Act, 1892, ss. 6, 8.—A finding of the magistrates that a certain street is a highway repairable by the inhabitants at large is not conclusive, and does not operate as a judgment in rem. in any subsequent proceedings taken by the local authority respecting the same street against different parties.

8. Repairs—New road in place of old—Obligation to repair ratione tenurse—Local Government Act, 1894 (56 & 57 Vict. c. 73), s. 25 (2).—In the year 1773 O. was the owner of lands now comprised in the plaintiffs' district, through which there passed an old highway. O. desired to stop up and inclose this highway, and in due course received licence to do so on his undertaking to make, as he did, upon his own land, another road in lieu of the old road, "as fit for horses, carts, carriages, and foot passengers to pass and repass," and on his undertaking that he and his heirs would keep the substituted road in repair.

The defendant was the owner and occupier of part of the lands formerly held by O., and the plaintiffs desired to make him liable for the repair of the road.

Held, that the defendant was liable ratione tenuræ as being an assign of O., and that he was none the less liable because he was the assign of part only of such land.—ESHER URBAN DISTRICT COUNCIL v. MARKS, K.B D., 330; 71 L. J. K. B. 309; 86 L. T. 222.

9. Repairable by inhabitants—Substitution—Disrepair—Order under section 10 of Highways and Locomotives Act, 1878—Width not specified in indictment—Liability of defaulting highway authority.—In 1891, by an order of quarter sessions, a highway was stopped and a new road substituted for it, which was made by the owner, at whose instance the change was made. The certificate stated that the new road was 12 yards wide, but in fact it was 14 yards or 15 yards wide.

The new road having got into bad repair, an order was made, under section 10 of the Highways and Locomotives Act, 1878, on the defendants, and an indictment was preferred.

After the order the defendants served notices on the frontagers under section 150 of the Public Heath Act, 1875.

The width of the road was not specified in the indictment, and the jury found that the old road was a highway repairable by the inhabitants at large before 1835.

Held, that judgment was rightly entered for the Crown.—REX v. CROMPTON DISTRICT COUNCIL, K.B.D.; 86 L. T. 762.

10. Surveyor of highways—Power to incur expenditure—Agreement with county council—Construction of bridge—Agreement for payment of money after expiration of surveyor's term of office—Liability of rural district council as successor to surveyor of highways—Highways and Bridges Act, 1891 (54 & 55 Vict. c. 63), s. 3—Local Government Act, 1894 (56 & 57 Vict. c. 73), s. 25.—The surveyor of highways for a parish, acting on behalf of himself and his successors as highway authority, entered into an agreement with the county council for the payment of a sum of money in two instalments by the highway authority for the parish towards the expenses to be incurred in the construction of a bridge. The second instalment was agreed to be paid on a date after the expiration of the surveyor's year of office. Before the expiration of that year the rural district council, under section 25 of the Local Government Act, 1894, became the highway authority for the parish. The work of constructing the bridge lasted a year. In an action by the county council against the rural district council to recover the second instalment,

Held, that the surveyor of highways had power, under section 3 of the Highways and Bridges Act, 1891, to enter into the contract, and that the rural district council were liable, as his successors, to pay the second instalment.—HERTFORDSHIRE COUNTY COUNCIL v. BARNET RURAL DISTRICT COUNCIL, C.A, 582; [1902] 2 K. B. 48; 71 L. J. K. B. 610; 86 L T. 880.

HONG KONG, LAW of:—

1. Company—Adoption of articles of association—Registration of unsigned articles—Acquiescence.—Although a special resolution is the statutory mode of enacting articles of association, the adoption thereof by a company may be proved by a long course of acquiescence.

The unsigned articles of a company incorporated under Hong Kong Ordinance I. of 1865 (similar to the English Companies Act, 1862) were irregularly registered along with its memorandum of association; but it appeared that they had for nineteen years been published, acted on without objection, and from time to time amended and added to by special resolutions.

Held, that they must be treated as valid and operative, and as having been adopted by the shareholders.—HO TUNG v. MAN ON INSURANCE CO., P.C.; [1902] A. C. 232; 71 L. J. P. C. 46; 85 L. T. 617.

2. Statute of Limitations (Ordinance No. 13 of 1864)—Administrator—Right to sue—Vesting of intestate's property in registrar of court.—H., who carried on business in partnership with the appellants, died intestate in 1880. In 1886 a will was produced, and probate was granted to the executor named therein. In 1896 the probate was revoked on the ground that the alleged will was a forgery. In 1897 letters of administration were granted to the respondent, and in 1899 he brought an action against the appellants for an account.

Held, that the Statute of Limitations only began to run from the grant of letters of administration in 1897, and that the action was not barred. By Ordinance No. 8 of 1860 and Ordinance No. 9 of 1870, the property of intestates is vested in the registrar of the Supreme Court until administration is granted, and he is given power to get in and protect the estate, but no power to sue is conferred upon him.

Held, that no right of action accrued to the registrar on the death of the intestate which would make the statute run from that date.—CHAN KIT SAN v. HO FUNG HANG, P.C.; [1902] A. C. 257; 71 L. J. C. P. 49; 86 L. T. 245.

INCLOSURE:—

1. Action for breach of duty to repair roads—Canon of construction to be applied in construing Act.—By an Inclosure Act passed in the 7 Geo. 3 with reference to the inclosure of certain commons and waste grounds known as B. Moor, after reciting that the persons interested were owners and proprietors of messuages, &c., in the several townships therein mentioned, including, amongst others, the township of W., it was enacted that the commissioners should appoint and undertake the repair of (inter alia) two roads mentioned in the statement of claim.

The plaintiffs alleged that these roads were duly made in accordance with the award, and were for many years kept in repair by the surveyor of the township of W., and that the said township was included in the defendant urban district, and that the defendants were liable to repair them.

There was no evidence, that the inhabitants of W., taken as a body, had ever in fact repaired or paid for the repair of the roads in question since 1767, although it was shown that since 1859 certain of the inhabitants of the township had contributed towards the repair of the roads for their own convenience. It was contended by the plaintiffs that liability to repair the roads in question was imposed upon the defendants.

Held, in the circumstances, that the court was justified in reading in after the words "in such manner as other public highways are by law directed to be repaired by such of the said townships respectively" the words "within whose district such public highways are situated"; that the doctrine of contemporanea expositio did not apply; that the defendants were not liable to repair the roads in question as the same were outside their district; and that in construing an Inclosure Act it is right to take the whole of the document as one complete document. It is not sufficient to take out one section and disregard others which are germane to the same subject.

2. Private road—Pasturage—Ownership of soil—User in excess of award—Prescription—Presumption of lost grant.—By an award made under an Inclosure Act of 1812, which was passed for the draining, inclosing, and improving of a district of fen country, it was provided that all the herbage which should from time to time grow upon all the private roads therein set out should belong to and be the property of the surveyor of highways for the time being, to be by him let annually for the depasturing of sound and healthy sheep, but of no other cattle or stock whatever.

The plaintiff was the occupier of a farm, allotted under the award, adjoining a private road. Since 1846 the pasturage of this private road, along with other roads, had been let annually, pursuant to directions given at public vestry meetings, without any restriction providing for depasturing sheep only. In an action by the plaintiff against the rural district council (the successors of the surveyor of highways) complaining of their having let the road for the depasturing of the cattle and horses,

Held, that, inasmuch as the restriction of pasturage to sheep was part of a permanent scheme for the drainage of a large area of land, and was intended for the benefit of the public and not only of the owners of land adjoining the road, any grant of a right to depasture cattle or horses on the road would have been illegal; and, therefore, the court ought not to presume a lost grant of any such right.

An infant member of a building society purchased a piece of land by means of a loan from the society, and gave the society a mortgage to secure the loan and further advances which were expended in building houses on the land.

Held, that the society was entitled to a charge on the land for the actual purchase-money, with interest at 4 per cent. thereon, but that by reason of the Infants' Relief Act, 1874, the mortgage was void as against the infant, and must be delivered up to be cancelled.

perty Act, 1881, so as to entitle them to enter into possession of the land and receive the rents and profits under that section.—HELYAR, RE. HELYAR v. BECKETT, Ch.D. Joyce, J., 285; [1902] 1 Ch. 391; 71 L. J. Ch. 209; 85 L. T. 627.

4. Ward of court—Testamentary guardian—Guardian's change of religion—Removal of guardian—A testator, who died in 1896, by his will appointed his sister guardian of his infant daughter, then aged eleven. The testator was a Protestant, and the infant was brought up in that faith. In 1900 the sister, from conscientious motives, became a Roman Catholic.

Held, that, under the circumstances, it was for the benefit of the infant that the testator's sister should be removed from her guardianship.—F. v. F., Ch.D. Farwell, J.; [1902] 1 Ch. 688; 71 L. J. Ch 415.

INHERITANCE:—

Root of descent—"Purchaser"—Devise to testator's "right heirs" — Co-heiresses — Joint tenancy or tenancy in common—Inheritance Act, 1833 (3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 106), s. 3.—Under a devise to or in trust for a testator's "right heirs," the person who at the time of the testator's death is his heir-at-law takes now, by virtue of section 3 of the Inheritance Act, 1833, as devisee, and not by descent as before the Act.

The word "heir" in that section includes "heirs."

And section 3 operates also to alter the quality of the estate taken by the heir; so that, if a testator leaves co-heiresses, they, under such a devise, take as joint tenants, not as tenants in common.

INJUNCTION:—

Injunction to restrain nuisance after nuisance abated.—The plaintiffs claimed damages in respect of injury caused to their trees and crops by smoke and effluvia from the defendants' works. They also claimed an injunction to restrain continuance of the nuisance. The nuisance had ceased owing to defendants having stopped work after action brought.

Held, that the plaintiffs were entitled to an injunction and an inquiry as to damages.—DEAN OF CHESTER v. SMELTING CORPORATION, Ch.D. Farwell, J.; 85 L. T. 67.

INLAND REVENUE:—

1. Beer—War tax—Conditional contract of sale—Incidence of tax—Customs Consolidation Act, 1876 (39 & 40 Vict. c. 36), s. 20—Finance Act, 1900 (63 Vict. c. 7), s. 8.—By section 20 of the Customs Consolidation Act, 1876, as applied by section 8 of the Finance Act, 1900, the new excise duty on beer imposed by the latter Act may be added to the contract price of the beer where the contract or agreement for the sale or delivery of the beer duty paid was made before the passing of the Act.

An agreement under which the purchaser is bound to buy his beer from a certain brewer, provided the latter is willing to sell it to him duty paid, at a certain price is not a contract for the sale or delivery of the beer within section 20. The contract for sale in such case is made only when the order for the delivery of beer is given to the brewer in pursuance of the conditional agreement, and, if such order was given after the passing of the Finance Act, 1900, the brewer is not entitled under section 8 to add the new duty to the price payable by the purchaser though the conditional agreement was made before it. — NEWBRIDGE RHONDDA BREWERY CO. v. EVANS, K.B.D.; 86 L. T. 453.

2. Corporation duty — Real property — Cricket ground—Principle of assessment—"Annual value"—Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1885 (48 & 49 Vict. c. 51). s. 11.—The Surrey County Cricket Club, an unincorporated body, were lessees of the Kennington Oval Cricket Ground. Parts of the property comprised in the lease were underlet by the club, but the rest was in their possession. The club had also certain investments of stock from which they received income. The other receipts of the club were members' subscriptions, gate-moneys, and other payments received from the public for viewing cricket and other matches played on the ground.

Held, that the gate-money and other payments received from the public are not "annual value, income, or profits of the property" within section 11 of the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1885, and that, for the purposes of assessment to duty under section 11, the "annual value" of the real property of the club should be ascertained on the basis of assessments to income tax under Schedule A of the Income Tax Act, 1842, subject to deductions for repairs and ground-rent; and, further, that in respect of income derived from stocks, the club should be assessed under Schedule C, and in respect of their income from land under Schedule B.—SURREY COUNTY CRICKET CLUB, RE, K.B.D., 173; [1901] 2 K B. 400; 70 L. 3. Estate duty — Annuities — Amount set apart to pay—Settlement estate duty—Property settled by will — Bequest of residue — Finance Act, 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. c. 30), s. 5, sub-section 1; s. 22—Settled Land Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 38), s. 2, sub-section 1.—A testator by his will devised and bequeathed all his real and personal estate to trustees on trust for conversion into money, and out of the moneys so produced to pay his funeral and testamentary expenses, and debts, and certain pecuniary legacies given by the will, and to set aside a sufficient amount of the residuary estate upon trust to pay annuities for life to certain persons, and, subject to that provision, to divide the residuary estate in certain proportions among residuary legatees. The trustees did, in pursuance of the testator's directions, set aside out of the residuary estate a certain amount, which they invested so as to produce an income sufficient to pay the annuities,

Held, that the fund so set aside was property settled by the testator's will within the meaning of the Finance Act, 1894, s. 5, sub-section 1, and therefore settlement estate duty was payable upon it.—CAMPBELL, RE, C.A.; [1902] 1 K. B. 113; 71 L. J. K. B. 160; 85 L. T. 708.

4. Estate duty—Incidence—Settled fund—Will—Exercise of general power of appointment over reversionary interest—Direction to pay testamentary expenses out of residue—Finance Act, 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. c. 30).—Where a fund is held in trust for A. for life, and after his death for B. for life, and after B.'s death for A., either absolutely or by way of general power of appointment; on A.'s death estate duty becomes payable in respect, not of the reversionary interest, but of the whole settled fund; and inasmuch as this does not pass to A.'s executors, B. or the trustees of the fund, and not A.'s executors, are accountable for the duty, and it is payable out of the settled fund and not out of the residue.

The duty in these circumstances is not a testamentary expense.—DIXON, RE, PENFOLD v. DIXON, Ch.D. Buckley, J., 203; [1902] 1 Ch. 248; 71 L. J. Ch. 96; 85 L. T. 622.

5. Estate duty—Settled property—Mortgage by tenant for life and remaindermen for benefit of remaindermen—Indemnity to tenant for life—Value of property passing on death of tenant for life—Finance Act, 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. c 30), ss. 1, 2 (1) (b), and 7 (7).—By his will the Duke of B. settled a certain estate on his wife for life, then on his second son, Lord M., for life, with remainder in fee tail on the eldest son of Lord M. With the consent of the duchess-dowager Lord M. and his said son disentailed the estate and resettled it subject to the life estate of the duchess-dowager to such uses as Lord M. and his son should jointly appoint, and in default of appointment to the use of Lord M. for life, with remainder to his said son in tail male. In exercise of the above power of appointment Lord M. and his son—the duchess-dowager joining in in respect of her life estate only—mortgaged the estate in fee to secure a sum of £27,000, which money was entirely for the benefit of Lord M. and his son, and they alone entered into the personal covenants. By an indenture of even date between the duchess-dowager and Lord M. and his said son the latter jointly and severally covenanted to indemnify the former from any liability or loss of profits or any action or suit arising through or from the mortgage, and they conveyed an annuity and rent-charge to trustees as security for the performance of the covenant. On the death in 1895 of the duchess-dowager, Lord M., in delivering an account for the purposes of assessing estate duty, claimed to deduct the mortgage debt of £27,000 from the capital value of the said settled estate.

Held, that as the duchess-dowager during her life must be deemed to have been beneficially interested in the estate to its full value, the estate which passed on her death was the full beneficial life interest in it, and that estate duty was therefore payable without deduction of the incumbrance of £27,000.—ATTORNEY-GENERAL v. MONTAGU (LORD), K.B.D., 270; [1902] 1 K. B. 429; 71 L. J. K. B. 333; 86 L. T. 57.

6. Estate duty—Succession duty—Gift of sum of money in lieu of legacy in consideration of an annuity —Bonâ fide purchase—Exception for money consideration—Finance Act, 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. c. 30), ss. 2 (1) (c), 3 (2)—Succession Duty Act, 1853 (16 & 17 Vict. c. 51), s. 7.—An unincorporated society, which was associated for charitable purposes of a religious character, and which was possessed of considerable funds held by its trustees and disposed of by its directors, in acceptance of an offer by C. B., one of its directors, entered into an arrangement in 1889 that, in consideration of the payment to the society of £500 in lieu of a legacy by the said C. B., the society would pay the sum of £25 per annum to C. B. during his life, and a like payment to his wife during her life should she survive him. C. B. died in 1895, and his widow died in 1900. The Crown claimed that, upon the death of C. B., estate duty became payable by the society under the Finance Act, 1894, s. 2 (1) (c), on the whole sum of £500, and that upon the death of the widow succession duty became payable by the society on the £500 under section 7 of the Succession Duty Act, 1853. The commercial value of the annuity, it appeared, was £210.

Held, that, as regards estate duty, the whole sum of £500 was, in the first instance, taxable under section 2 (1) (c), but that as the commercial value of the annuity was £210, that sum, representing the purchase-money, must be deducted under section 3 (2), and duty paid on £290 only. Further, that, as regards succession duty, the transaction was a bonâ fide sale within the meaning of section 7 of the Succession Duty Act, 1853, and that, therefore, no succession duty was payable on the death of the widow.—ATTORNEY-GENERAL v. JOHNSON, K.B.D., 366; [1902] 1 K. 7. Estate tail—Scotch testator—Money to be laid out in the purchase of land in England—Discretion—Finance Act, 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. c 30), s. 23.—Where a testator gave a sum of money in trust for the purpose of purchasing land in Scotland to be entailed in accordance with the directions of his will, and by codicil authorized his trustees (if in their discretion they should think it desirable) in place of purchasing land in Scotland to purchase land in England to be entailed according to English law,

Held, that the money, or so much of it as for the time being remained uninvested in land, was not "entailed estate" within the meaning of the provisions of the Finance Act, 1894, applicable to Scotland.—LORD ADVOCATE v. STEWART. H.L., 673; [1902] A. C. 344; 71 L. J. P. C. 66; 86 L. T. 603.

8. Income tax—Benefice, incumbent of—Perquisites or gains accruing by reason of office—Grant by affiliated branch of Queen Victoria Clergy Sustentation Fund—Public office or employment of profit—Income Tax Acts, 1842 (5 & 6 Vict. c. 35), s. 146; 1853 (16 & 17 Vict. c. 34), s. 2, Schedule E.—The appellant, a beneficed clergyman, received for several years an annual charitable grant of money from one of the diocesan branches affiliated to the Queen Victoria Clergy Sustentation Fund, which is a body incorporated with the object of giving pecuniary assistance to poor clergymen holding benefices. The funds of the diocesan branch were administered by a council under rules which provided that no assistance should be given where the income of the applicant's benefice exceeded £200 a year, or where, though the income of his benefice did not exceed that sum, he was not a poor man, and that the onus should rest upon the applicant of deciding whether his own circumstances justified him in applying for charitable assistance out of the funds. The giving, withholding, continuance, or discontinuance at any time, of grants out of the funds were matters wholly within the discretion of the council.

Held, that the sums received by the appellant from the diocesan branch were not "perquisites or profits accruing by reason of" his office within the meaning of the first rule, contained in section 146 of the Income Tax Act, 1842, for charging duties under Schedule E, and therefore that he was not liable to pay income tax in respect of those sums. —HERBERT v. MCQUADE, K.B.D.; [1901] 2 K. 9. Income tax—Deductions—Sum payable or chargeable by virtue of any Act of Parliament—Income Tax Act, 1842 (5 & 6 Vict. c. 35), s. 146, rr. 1, 9—Manchester Corporation Act, 1891, s. 5.—The Manchester Corporation Act, 1891, empowered the corporation to establish a fund for encouraging thrift among its officers and servants, and for providing a fund for them or their representatives on their retirement or death. The scheme passed by the corporation provided that persons who were in their employ previous to the passing of the Act should, on their applying in writing, be admitted to the benefits of the fund, and having been admitted they could not, while in the service of the corporation, withdraw from the fund.

Held, that a servant of the corporation who had been so admitted on his own application could not deduct the amount of his payments to the fund from the amount payable by him for income tax, on the ground that it was a deduction pursuant to section 146, r. 1, of the Income Tax Act, 1842, by which duty is payable on salaries after deducting the amount of duties or other sums payable or chargeable on the same by virtue of any Act of Parliament.

The assured having elected to exercise the option, paid £66 17s 6d., the first premium, and received back as a loan £33.

Held, that the amount which the assured had paid in premium was £66 17s. 6d., and that he was entitled to claim exemption from income tax on the whole of that sum.—HUNTER v. REX, K.B.D., 618; [1902] 2 K. B. 255.

13. Income tax—Trade carried on partly abroad—Jurisdiction of Tax Commissioners—Prohibition.—An English joint stock company carrying on business in London was assessed to income tax by the Tax Commissioners in respect of the profits of a business carried on in America by an American company, which business and profits in the opinion of the commissioners were really the business and profits of the English company. The English company applied for a writ of prohibition to the commissioners on the ground that the business of the American company was not really their business, and the commissioners, therefore, could not, by deciding wrongly, give themselves jurisdiction to assess the English company in respect of the profits of the American company.

Held, that prohibition did not lie, and that if the commissioners decided wrongly, the proper remedy was an appeal upon a case stated.—REX v. CLERKENWELL INCOME TAX COMMISSIONERS, C.A.; [1901] 2 K. B. 879; 70 L. J. K. B. 1010; 85 L. T. 503.

14. Stamp duty — Conveyance on sale — Person authorized by statute to purchase property—Purchase of realty and chattels—Stamp duty on consideration for sale of chattels—Finance Act, 1895 (58 & 59 Vict. c. 16), s. 12.—By section 12 of the Finance Act, 1895, where by virtue of any Act, either (a) any property is vested by way of sale in any person, or (b) any person is authorized to purchase any property, such person shall produce to the Commissioners of Inland Revenue a copy of the Act or some instrument relating to the vesting in the first case, and an instrument of conveyance of the property in the other case, duly stamped with the ad valorem duty payable upon a conveyance on sale of the property.

Held, that the word "property" means specific property, whether real or personal, which is either vested in the purchaser by some Act or which the purchaser is authorized by some Act to purchase, and stamp duty is payable upon the whole consideration for the purchase.

15. Stamp duty—Lease—Bond, covenant, or instrument being the only or principal or primary security for any annuity—Ad valorem duty—Covenant relating to the matter of the lease—Lease of tramways by municipal corporation to electric traction company—Covenant to pay additional rent for repair of demised premises—Covenant to purchase electrical energy from corporation—Stamp Act, 1891 (54 & 55 Vict. c. 39), ss. 4, 77 (2); First Schedule.—By an indenture made between a municipal corporation and an electric traction company in pursuance of section 19 of the Tramways Act, 1870, the corporation demised to the company the right of user of certain tramways for a term of years. The indenture provided for the payment by the lessees of an annual rent of £3 250. It further provided for the payment by the lessees of an annual sum of £900 for the repair of the demised premises. It further provided that the lessees should pay the corporation an annual sum of £4,000 for the supply of electric energy. A special power of distress was given in the event of non-payment of any of the rents or moneys thereby made payable, except the payments to be made for or in respect of electrical energy.

Held, first, that the instrument was chargeable with ad valorem stamp duty on the total sum of £3,250 plus £900, the latter sum being in the nature of additional rent. Secondly, that it was not chargeable with any further stamp duty in respect of the sum of £4,000; for the provision for the payment of that sum was a "covenant relating to the matter of the lease" within the meaning of section 77, sub-section 2, of the Stamp Act, 1891, and therefore the lease, being made for a consideration in respect whereof it was chargeable with ad valorem duty and in further consideration of that covenant, was not to be charged with any duty in respect of such further consideration. —BRITISH ELECTRIC TRACTION CO. v. INLAND REVENUE COMMISSIONERS. C.A., 280; [1902] 1 K. B. 441; 71 L. J. K. B. 92; 85 L. T. 663.

16. Stamp duty—Loan capital—Issue of stock—Date of issue—Finance Act, 1899 (62 & 63 Vict. c. 9), s. 8.—The Finance Act, 1899 (which came into operation the 20th of June, 1899), by section 8, enacts that where any local authority, corporation, company, or body of persons propose to issue any loan capital, they shall, before the issue thereof, deliver to the Commissioners of Inland Revenue a statement of the amount proposed to be secured by the issue, and every such statement shall be charged with an ad valorem stamp duty.

Held, that by the time scrip certificates are issued to allottees the loan capital is issued within the meaning of section 8, and therefore the statement should be delivered to the Inland Revenue Commissioners before scrip certificates are issued.

Held, also, that where scrip certificates in respect of a loan to a corporation were issued to allottees before the 20th of June, 1899, although the payment of the final instalment in respect of the loan was not due or paid until after the 20th of June, 1899, section 8 of the Act had no application.—ATTORNEY-GENERAL v. LIVERPOOL CORPORATION, K.B.D., 328; [1902] 1 K. 17. Stamp duty—Railway company—"Increase in the amount of nominal share capital"—Conversion of stock—Stamp Act, 1891 (54 & 55 Vict. c. 39), s. 113. —The Midland Railway Co., in pursuance of a special Act, converted various classes of stock, preferential and ordinary, into other stocks of higher nominal value, but bearing a corresponding lower rate of interest.

Held, that, although nothing was added to the working capital of the company, yet there was an "increase of the amount of the nominal share capital" within the meaning of the Stamp Act, 1891, s. 113.

Decision of the Court of Appeal (49 W. R. 243, [1901] 1 Q. B. 220), affirmed.—MIDLAND RAILWAY CO. v. ATTORNEY-GENERAL, H.L., 433; [1902] A. C. 171; 71 L. J. K. B. 315; 86 L. T. 206.

18. Stamp duty—Separation deed—Agreement in consideration of fixed weekly payments—Duty assessable on covenant—Stamp Act, 1891 (54 & 55 Vict. c. 39), s. 4, and Schedule 1.—By the schedule to the Stamp Act, 1891, a bond, covenant, or instrument of any kind whatsoever, being the only or principal or primary security for any annuity (except upon the original creation thereof by way of sale or security, and except a superannuation annuity) or for any sum or sums of money at stated periods, not being interest for any principal sum secured by a duly stamped instrument or rent reserved by a lease or tack, is chargeable for a definite and certain period so that the total amount to be ultimately payable can be ascertained, with the same ad valorem duty as a bond or covenant for such total amount; if for the term of life or any other indefinite period with a duty of 2s. 6d. for every £5, and also for any fractional part of £5, of the annuity or sum periodically payable.

A deed of separation entered into by the appellant and his wife contained a clause to the effect that the appellant would and should during the joint lives of himself and his wife, if his wife should continue to perform and observe the stipulations therein contained and on her part to be performed and observed, pay to his wife "the clear weekly sum of £1," and in the event of the wife surviving the appellant and not having forfeited payment during his lifetime, the sum should continue to be paid to her by her husband's representatives.

Held, that the agreement was a security for an indefinite period for a sum of money at weekly periods, and not for an annuity or yearly sum payable by weekly instalments, and was, therefore, only liable to ad valorem duty upon the sum agreed to be paid weekly, and not upon the total amount of such weekly payments for a year.

19. Stamp duty — Settlement — Instrument of appointment—Stamp Act, 1891 (54 & 55 Vict. c. 39), s. 6, sub-sections 1 and 2—First Schedule "Settlement"—Exemption.—By a deed of settlement dated the 26th of June, 1895, the settlor granted to trustees certain funds, and by a deed dated the 12th of December, 1896, certain other funds, upon trust for his five children, but so nevertheless that the share of each child should be held by the trustees upon trust to pay the income thereof to such child during his or her life, and after his or her death upon trust for such one or more of the others as such child should by will appoint, and in default of appointment for the other children in equal shares. It was further provided that the trustees should have power, on or subsequent to the marriage of any of the children, to revoke the trusts of the settlement and to declare, as they thought fit, new trusts by way of resettlement for the benefit of such child, or any wife or husband of such child, or such child's children or remoter issue, or the next-of-kin of such child, but not in favour of any other person or persons, and to transfer the funds to the trustees of such settlement. These deeds were stamped with ad valorem duty as settlements.

By two deeds, both dated the 10th of April, 1899, the trustees of the settlements of the 26th of June, 1895, and the 12th of December, 1896, revoked the trusts of those settlements so far as they concerned the share of C. E. H.-R., one of the children, who was then about to be married, and declared that such share should, from and after the solemnization of the intended marriage, be held upon trust to pay the income thereof to C. E. H.-R., during his life, and after his decease to transfer such share to trustees of the marriage settlement of C. E. H.-R., to be held by them upon the trusts declared in the marriage settlement. These deeds were each stamped with a duty of ten shillings.

By the marriage settlement, a deed of even date with the two last-mentioned deeds, it was provided that after the death of C. E. H.-R. the trustees of the settlement should stand possessed of his share of the funds comprised in the settlement of the 26th of June, 1895, and the 12th of December, 1896, upon the trusts of the settlement, which were, as regards the husband's fund, after the death of the husband, to pay the income to the intended wife during her life, and after her death upon trust for the children or remoter issue of the intended marriage as the intending husband and wife jointly, or the survivor of them, should appoint, and in default of appointment in trust for the children in equal shares.

Held, that the marriage settlement was not, as regards the share of C. E. H.-R. in the funds comprised in the settlements of the 26th of June, 1895, and the 12th of December, 1896, exempt from the payment of settlement duty, either under the exemption under the heading "Settlement" in the First Schedule to the Stamp Act, 1891, or under section 106, sub-section 1, of the Act.

20. Succession duty—Acceleration of succession—Power of appointment—Extinction of prior interest—Finance Act, 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. c. 30), s. 18—Succession Duty Act, 1853 (16 & 17 Vict. c. 51), ss. 2, 15.—By a settlement made in 1883 the Blackmoor estate was settled upon such trusts and with and subject to such powers as the then (first) Lord Selborne and Viscount Wolmer should by deed appoint, and in default of or until appointment to the use of Lord Selborne for life, and after his death to the use of Viscount Wolmer in fee simple, if he should survive Lord Selborne, and, if not, then to the use of the first son of Viscount Wolmer who should attain twenty-one, and in default of such son to the use of the first Lord Selborne in fee simple.

In 1894 the first Lord Selborne and Viscount Wolmer by deed appointed that from and after the date of the deed the Blackmoor estate should go and remain to the use of Viscount Wolmer in fee simple for his own absolute use and benefit.

The first Lord Selborne died in 1895, and the Crown claimed succession duty under the Succession Duty Act, 1853, on the principal value of the Blackmoor estate.

Held (reversing the judgment of the King's Bench Division), that the title to the succession created by the settlement of 1883 was not accelerated "by the surrender or extinction" of the prior life estate by the exercise of the power of appointment in 1894 within the meaning of section 15 of the Succession Duty Act, 1853, and that succession duty was not payable.—ATTORNEY-GENERAL v. SELBORNE (EARL), C.A., 210; [1902] 1 K. INSURANCE:—

1. Accident—Principal and agent—Misstatements in proposal made by agent of insurers without knowledge of insured—Authority of agent.—A policy of insurance against accidental injury was effected with an insurance company through their local agent. The proposal form was filled up by the agent, many of the answers filled in by him being false in material respects; the false answers were inserted without the knowledge or authority of the applicant, who signed the proposal form without reading it. The proposal contained a declaration in which the applicant agreed that the statements in the proposal should form the basis of the policy, and the policy contained a proviso that it was granted on the express condition of the truthfulness of the statements in the proposal. Shortly after payment of the premium the insured was accidentally injured.

Held, first, that it was the duty of the applicant to read the answers in the proposal before signing it, and that he must be taken to have read and adopted them; and, secondly, that in filling in the false answers in the proposal the agent was acting, not as the agent of the insurance company, but as the agent of the applicant; and that, therefore, the policy was void.—BIGGAR v. ROCK LIFE ASSURANCE CO., K.B.D.; [1902] 1 K. B. 516; 71 L. J. K. B. 79; 85 L. T. 636.

2. Bullion — Perils — "Arrests, restraints, and detainments"—"Warranted free of capture, seizure, and detention" — Bullion taken possession of by assured's government—Subsequent declaration of war.—Gold bullion the property of a Transvaal company was insured during transit from the Transvaal to the United Kingdom by a policy which covered the risks of "arrests, restraints, and detainments" of rulers, and which contained a clause "Warranted free of capture, seizure, and detention." The gold while in transit in the Transvaal was, on the 2nd of October, 1899, removed from a railway train and taken possession of by officials acting under the orders of the Transvaal Government. At that date it was anticipated that war would shortly break out between the Transvaal and this country, and war did in fact begin on the 9th of October. According to the law of the Transvaal the taking of the gold was in the circumstances a legal act. In an action on the policy,

Held, that the gold had been seized within the meaning of the warranty, and that the plaintiffs could not recover a loss under the policy.—ROBINSON GOLD MINING CO v. ALLIANCE MARINE, &c., ASSURANCE CO., K.B.D., 109; [1901] 2 K. B. 919; 70 L J. K. B. 892; 85 L. T. 419.

3. Bullion—"Arrests, restraints, detainments"—Outbreak of war—Seizure—Property in enemy's territory—Right of assured to recover.—The plaintiffs were a company incorporated and registered in Natal, and owning and working a gold mine in the Transvaal. On the outbreak of the war on the 11th of October, 1899, between the South African Republic and Great Britain the plaintiffs ceased to work their mine. A few days after the war had begun, gold products which had been extracted from the plaintiffs' mine before that date were seized by the officials of the South African Republic while still in the plaintiffs' possession. The plaintiffs had effected an insurance of the produce of their mine by a policy covering arrests, restraints, and detainments of kings, princes, and people. In an action on the policy to recover the value of the gold seized,

Held, that the plaintiffs were not disentitled by any principle of public policy from recovering the loss.—NIGEL GOLD MINING CO. v. HOADE, K.B.D., 108; [1901] 2 K. B. 849; 70 L. J. K. B. 1006; 85 L. T. 482.

4. Fire insurance — Arbitration clause — English contract—Law of Jersey.—A policy of insurance against fire upon property in Jersey issued by an English office in the English language but executed in Jersey was made subject to a condition that no action should be brought for any money payable under the policy until the liability and the amount had been settled by arbitration; and it was also provided that the submission should be subject to the provisions of the Arbitration Act, 1889, and might be made a rule of court.

Held, that the contract was governed by the law of England and not by the law of Jersey.—SPURRIER v. LA CLOCHE, P.C.; [1902] A. C. 446; 86 L. T. 631.

5. Life—Policy taken out in name of a stranger—Intention—Resulting trust.—A person took out a policy of insurance on his own life "for the behoof of" his wife's sister. After his wife's death he went through the form of marriage with her. She predeceased him. He always held the policy, and paid the premiums himself both before and after her death.

Held, that though her legal personal representatives were the persons entitled to receive the money at law and give a receipt for it, in equity the money belonged to the legal personal representatives of the person who had taken out the policy and paid the premiums, there being no proof that it was intended for her benefit.—SCOTTISH EQUITABLE LIFE ASSURANCE SOCIETY'S POLICY, RE, Ch.D. Joyce, J., 327; [1902] 1 Ch. 282; 71 L. J. Ch. 189; 85 L. T. 720.

6. Life—Proposal—Continuing declaration—Insurance in other office—Proviso—Second proposal and policy between first proposal and policy.—A policy contained a proviso "that if the insured be at any time during the continuance of this policy insured against death or disablement by accident or disease in any other company without notice being given to the said directors and their written consent obtained . . . this policy shall be absolutely void." After the proposal for this policy was made, but before it was issued, the insured made a proposal, which was accepted, and the policy issued, by another company. No consent was obtained in accordance with the proviso.

Held, that the first policy was void. Declarations made in the proposal for a policy are in the nature of continuing declarations until the issue of the policy.—MARSHALL AND SCOTTISH EMPLOYERS' LIABILITY CO., RE, K.B.D.; 85 L. T. 757.

7. Marine—Freight—Lump chartered freight—Insurance—On "freight chartered or as if chartered"—Loss not by perils insured against—Cesser of liability clause—Loss of bill of lading freight—Waiver of lien for chartered freight.—Shipowners chartered a ship for a voyage at a lump freight, the charterers' liability to cease upon shipment of the cargo, provided the cargo was worth the freight, dead freight, and demurrage on arrival, and the vessel to have a lien on the cargo for the recovery of all freight, dead freight, demurrage, and all other charges. The shipowners and charterers jointly insured the lump freight "chartered or as if chartered value" at the lump sum "on board or not on board." The charterers loaded the ship with a general cargo, and the master signed bills of lading by which the goods mentioned in each bill were made deliverable upon payment of the bill of lading freight payable in respect of those goods. The aggregate of the bill of lading freight exceeded the chartered freight. On the voyage part of the cargo was lost by jettison upon the ship running aground. The cargo which arrived was worth the freight, dead freight, and demurrage. Owing to the loss of cargo the bill of lading freight payable on the cargo delivered was less than the chartered freight. To recover the difference an action was brought on the policy by the shipowners and charterers jointly.

Held, that the action was not maintainable, the loss having been caused not by perils of the seas, but by the master's not having reserved in the bills of lading the lien over the whole cargo for the chartered freight.

The decision of the Court of Appeal (reported as Brankelow Steamship Co. v. Canton Insurance Office, 47 W. R. 611, [1899] 2 Q. B. 178) affirmed.—WILLIAMS & CO. v. CANTON INSURANCE OFFICE, H.L.; [1901] A. C. 462; 70 L. J. K. B. 962; 85 L. T. 317.

8. Marine — General average — Charter-party — Voyage out and home—General average sacrifice on outward voyage—Liability of homeward freight to contribute.—A ship was chartered to proceed to a foreign port and there load a cargo for carriage to a home port, the chartered freight to be paid on delivery of the cargo. The ship sailed in ballast, and before she arrived at the foreign port of loading she sustained a general average loss. She proceeded on her voyage, loaded a cargo in accordance with the charter-party, carried it home, and delivered it, and the chartered freight was duly paid. In an action by the shipowners against the underwriters on ship,

Held, that the chartered freight was liable to contribute in general average.

Judgment of Mathew, J. (ante, p. 42, [1901] 2 K. B. 861), affirmed.—CARISBROOK STEAMSHIP CO. v. LONDON AND PROVINCIAL MARINE INSURANCE CO., C.A., 691.

9. Marine — General average sacrifice — Joint ownership of ship and cargo—Liability of underwriters.—A sacrifice made to avert perils of the sea is a general average act, quite independently of unity or diversity of ownership. Although the assured is the owner both of ship and of cargo, the underwriters of a policy on cargo are liable to pay his loss by reason of the deduction made by the underwriters of the policy on the ship in respect of his contribution as the owner of cargo.

Decision of Mathew, J. (49 W. R. 221, [1901] 1 K. B. 147), affirmed.

Judgment of Barnes, J., in The Brigella ([1893] P. 189, 41 W. R. Dig. 92), disapproved.—MONTGOMERY & CO. v. THE INDEMNITY MUTUAL MARINE INSURANCE CO., C.A., 440; [1902] 1 K. B. 734; 71 L. J. K. B. 467; 86 L. T. 462.

10. Marine—General average—Policy on ship valued at £33 000—Ship found of the value of £40,000—Liability of underwriters.—The plaintiffs insured their ship Balmoral with the defendant and other underwriters, the value of the ship by agreement being put at £33,000.

During the currency of the policy The Balmoral received certain salvage services in respect of which a salvage award was made in the Admiralty Court against the ship, freight, and cargo, and certain general average expenses were also incurred.

In a salvage action the value of the ship was proved by her owners to be £40,000, and the average adjusters accepted that figure as the contributory value of the ship for the purpose also of the general average. The shipowners sought to recover from the underwriters the whole of the ship's proportion of the salvage and of the general average contribution.

Held, on appeal, affirming the decision of Bigham, J. (49 W. R. 137, [1900] 2 Q. B. 748), that the underwriters were liable only to pay thirty-three-fortieths of the £40 000 the proportion which the value in the policy bore to the actual value on which the statement had been made.—BALMORAL STEAMSHIP CO. v. MARTEN C.A., 35; [1901] 2 K. B. 896; 70 L. J. K. B. 1018; 85 L. T. 389.

11. Marine—Insured value to be taken as repaired value—Reinsurance against total loss—"To pay as may be paid thereon."—Attached to a policy of insurance on a vessel was a clause that "the insured value shall be taken as the repaired value in ascertaining whether the vessel is a constructive total loss. The vessel was valued at £16,000 and was insured against all risks. The underwriter effected a policy of reinsurance on the vessel against total, including constructive total, loss only "being a reinsurance applying to policy or policies and to pay as may be paid thereon." During the period covered by the policies the vessel ran ashore, and notice of abandonment was given. The vessel could have been repaired at a less sum than £16,000, and if the ordinary rules had been applied the vessel would have been a constructive total loss.

Held, that the reinsurers were not liable under the reinsurance policy, since the original underwriter was not liable for a constructive total loss, and that the words "pay as may be paid thereon" meant that he could only recover such a sum as he could have been compelled to pay.—MARTEN v. STEAMSHIP OWNERS' UNDERWRITING ASSOCIATION, K.B.D., 587.

12. Marine — Policy on cattle — "Restraint of people"—Inability to land cattle at foreign port owing to order prohibiting landing—"Warranted free of capture, seizure, and detention."—Under a Lloyd's policy cattle were insured for a voyage from Liverpool to Buenos Ayres against "arrests, restraints, and detainments of princes and people." The policy also contained the following clause: "Warranted free of capture, seizure, and detention." Prior to the shipment the Argentine Government passed a decree prohibiting the entry of animals suffering from contagious diseases. On arrival at Buenos Ayres the authorities refused to allow the cattle to be landed, as they were found to be suffering from a contagious disease. The cattle, being transhipped, were subsequently sold at a considerable loss.

Held, in an action on the policy, that such a loss was not a loss within the policy, and that the mere operation of a municipal law affecting or preventing the delivery of the insured goods at their destination was no restraint of people" within the meaning of the policy; that the words did not cover the operation of the ordinary law of the land, but related only to some violent departure from the ordinary course of things.

Held, also, that "warranted free of capture, seizure, and detention" freed the underwriters from liabilities under the words arrests, restraints, and detainments in the body of the policy.—MILLAR v. LAW ACCIDENT INSURANCE SOCIETY, K.B.D., 474; 71 L. J. K. B. 551.

13. Marine—Policy on "chartered or hire money" to cover "loss of hire money"—Loss of hire through vessel becoming inefficient—Government charter-party—Option to discharge vessel—Loss by discharge of vessel—Right of assured to recover.—By a charter-party in the Government form the Admiralty chartered a vessel for transport service for three months certain, and thenceforward until they should give notice to the owners that the vessel was discharged from their service, such notice to be given when the vessel was in port in the United Kingdom; and the charter-party provided that if the ship became incapable from any defect, or from any cause whatsoever, to perform the service efficiently, the Admiralty might make abatement by way of mulct out of the freight. The shipowners effected a time policy upon "chartered or hire money" to "cover the loss of hire money calculated at" so much per day caused by (amongst other things) want of repairs or breakdown of machinery, rendering the vessel inefficient for the service. Under the charter-party the vessel had made a voyage and had returned to England, and, the three months having previously expired, the Admiralty had continued the employment, and had given instructions that the vessel was to proceed on another voyage on a certain day. While the vessel was in dry dock it was discovered that some of the blades of her propeller were cracked and that it would take some time to repair the damage. In consequence of this the Admiralty, under their option in the charter-party, gave the owners notice discharging the vessel, and the vessel was discharged from the Government service as from that date. The vessel then underwent repairs, which took fifteen days from the date of her discharge by the Admiralty. In an action on the policy by the owners of the ship to recover from the insurers the loss of hire money for the fifteen days,

Held, that there was no loss under the policy for which the shipowners were entitled to recover. —MANCHESTER LINERS v. BRITISH AND FOREIGN MARINE INSURANCE CO., K.B.D.; 86 L. T. 148.

14. Marine—Policy on dog—All risks including mortality—Cattle clause—Walking to be deemed safe arrival.—A policy of insurance on a dog during transit from Liverpool to Lahore contained the following clause: "This insurance is against all risks, including mortality from any cause, jet ison and washing overboard, but walking at Lahore, Punjab, to be deemed a safe arrival." The dog was injured during the transit, and on arrival at Lahore could only walk on three legs.

Held, first, that the policy covered all risks, and not merely mortality; secondly, that the dog did not walk at Lahore within the meaning of the policy.—JACOB v. GAVILLER, K.B.D., 428.

15. Marine—Reinsurance—Delay in commencement of voyage—Alteration of risk.—The plaintiffs, by an open cover, insured all shipments of a firm of merchants for twelve months from the 11th of May at premiums varying with the date of sailing and the port of destination. On the 30th of July a declaration of a proposed shipment from the Tyne to Lulea was made under the cover, the premium for which was 12s. 9d. if the ship sailed in August and 15s. in September. The plaintiffs effected a reinsurance with the defendant at Lloyd's by a slip dated the 2nd of August, the premium payable to the defendant being 6s. 8d. The vessel was named in the slip, which contained also the reinsurance and deviation clauses. The vessel did not sail till the 25th of September, and with her cargo was totally lost on the 2nd of October. The plaintiffs' original policy under the cover was issued on the 25th of September, and the reinsurance policy was signed by the defendant on the 5th of October.

Held, that the delay in the commencement of the voyage constituted a material alteration in the risk, and that the defendant was not liable on the reinsurance policy.—MARITIME INSURANCE CO. v. STEARNS, K.B.D., 238; [1901] 2 K. B. 912; 71 L. J. K. 86.

16. Marine—Time policy—Continuation clause—Time policy for more than twelve months—Specification of particular risk—Stamp Act, 1891 (54 & 55 Vict. c. 39), s. 93.—A policy of marine insurance on a ship, expressed to be for and during a period of twelve months, contained a clause which provided that, if the ship was at sea or abroad at the expiration of the policy, it was agreed to hold her covered by the policy until arrival at the port of final destination. The ship was lost upon a homeward voyage after the expiration of the twelve months. In an action on the policy,

Held, that the policy was invalid for failure to satisfy the requirements of section 93 of the Stamp Act, 1891.

JUSTICES:—

1. Costs of appeal to quarter sessions—Payment by treasurer of county or borough—Alehouse Act, 1828 (9 Geo. 4, c. 61), s. 29—Local Government Act, 1888 (51 & 52 Vict. c. 41), s. 32.—By section 29 of the Alehouse Act, 1826, upon a successful appeal under the Act to quarter sessions from a decision of justices, the justices in quarter sessions are empowered to order the treasurer of "the county or place in and for which such justice whose judgment shall have been so reversed shall have acted on the occasion when he shall have given such judgment" to pay the respondent justices' costs.

A county borough had a separate commission of the peace, but not a separate court of quarter sessions; it was not directly subject to the county rate, but under a financial adjustment made under section 32 of the Local Government Act, 1888, it paid a fixed contribution towards the expenses of the county incurred in part on behalf of the borough, including the expenses of quarter sessions.

Held, that the county borough, not having a separate court of quarter sessions, and being liable to contribute to quarter sessions expenses, was not a place separate from the county, and therefore not a "place" within the meaning of section 29 of the Alehouse Act, 1828; that the licensing justices had acted for the county, that their costs were costs of quarter sessions, and that the order of quarter sessions had, therefore, been wrongly made upon the borough treasurer, and should have been made upon the treasurer of the county.—REX v. WARWICKSHIRE JUSTICES, K.B.D.; [1902] 2 K. B. 101; 71 L. J. K. B. 505; 86 L. T. 568.

2. Discretion to issue summons—Proceedings against Jesuits upon information under Roman Catholic Relief Act, 1829 (10 Geo. 4, c. 7), s 34—Indictable Offences Act, 1848 (11 & 12 Vict. c. 42), s 9.—Upon an application by a private person for summonses against three Jesuit priests on an information which alleged that they had committed an offence under section 34 of the Roman Catholic Relief Act, 1829, in that they had, since the commencement of the Act, been admitted or become Jesuits within the United Kingdom, and had thereby committed a misdemeanour, the magistrate refused to grant the summonses upon the ground that the application was wrongly instituted, as the enactment should be enforced by the Crown and not by a private informer; and, further, that the information was too scanty and too bare a statement and insufficient to support an application for a criminal process; and, therefore, in exercise of the discretion conferred upon him by the Indictable Offences Act, 1848, he dismissed the information.

Held, upon a rule nisi for a mandamus, that the learned magistrate had exercised the discretion conferred upon him, and that in the exercise of such discretion he had declined to grant the summonses, and, therefore, that the court ought not to interfere. —REX v. KENNEDY. K.B.D., 633; 86 L. 3. Jurisdiction—Summary conviction on charge of assault—Question as to title to land—Offences Against the Person Act, 1861 (24 & 25 Vict. c. 100) s. 46.—By section 46 of the Offences Against the Person Act, 1861, it is provided that nothing therein contained "shall authorize any justices to hear and determine any case of assault or battery in which any question shall arise as to the title to any land, tenements, or hereditaments, or any interest therein or accruing therefrom."

Where one commoner commits an assault upon another commoner for an alleged improper use by the latter of his right of common, and no question arises as to title to the common or any interest therein or accruing therefrom, the jurisdiction to hear and determine the case of assault is not ousted by the above proviso.

The words "title to" govern not only the words "lands, tenements, or hereditaments," but also the words "any interest therein or accruing therefrom"—REX v. FRENCH, ROBERTS, EX PARTE, K.B.D., 555; [1902] 1 K. B. 637; 71 L. J. K. B. 382; 86 L. T. 587.

4. Licensing law—Refusal to renew licences—Justices themselves the objectors—Notices of objection by the justices served on the licensees—Jurisdiction of same justices to hear and determine applications—Appeal entered to quarter sessions—Mandamus—Licensing Act, 1872 (35 & 36 Vict. c. 94), s. 42 sub-section 2—Licensing Act, 1874 (37 & 38 Vict. c. 49), s. 26 —The licensing justices of F. gave notice that they intended to object to the renewal of certain licences, having themselves previously taken steps to get information as to the requirements of the division and the number of licensed houses and on that information they considered there were too many licensed houses for the population.

The applications were made and refused. The licence-holders thereupon entered an appeal to quarter sessions, and also moved and obtained a rule nisi for a mandamus directed so the justices on the following grounds: (1) That the justices were not entitled to be objectors to the granting of the licences; (2) that if they were so entitled, and if in fact they did object, they were not entitled to sit and adjudicate on the applications; (3) that in these particular cases the justices were disqualified by reason of the steps they had taken to get information concerning the houses, and had prejudiced the case; and (4) that one of the justices was a member of the authority actively engaged in opposing the renewal of these licences, and had been party to a resolution in opposing them.

Held, discharging the rules, that the justices could raise these objections under section 42 of the Licensing Act, 1872, and that the proceedings were not invalid because the notice of objection had been given by the justices.

Held, also, that the notices of appeal to the quarter sessions were no bar to proceedings for mandamus, and conversely that the failure of the application for a mandamus did not invalidate the notice of appeal.—REX v. LICENSING JUSTICES OF FARNHAM, K.B.D., 573.

5. Penalty—Right of informer to share of penalty—Discretion of police magistrate.—Notwithstanding section 9 of the Betting Act, 1853, a metropolitan police magistrate who imposes a penalty on a defendant charged on an information with an offence under that Act has, by section 34 of the Metropolitan Police Courts Act, 1839, a discretion to deprive the informer of any share in the penalty, even though the informer has been guilty of no corrupt practice.—HAWKE v. MACKENZIE (No. 3), K.B.D.; [1902] 2 K. Held, that the natural and probable consequence of such conduct on the part of the appellant would be to occasion breaches of the peace being committed by others, and that the justices had jurisdiction to bind over the appellant in recognizances to be of good behaviour. — WISE v DUNNING, K.B.D., 317; [1902] 1 K. LAND TRANSFER:—

Registration—Conditions annexed to title—Building restrictions—Modification—Consent—"Persons principally interested"—Land Transfer Act, 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 87), s. 84.—Certain building land in Middlesex, forming part of a larger estate belonging to the defendants and registered with an absolute title, was sold by them to the plaintiff company. The defendants, in order to protect their remaining property, exacted from the company certain restrictive conditions as to the class of houses to be built upon the purchased land, and these conditions were registered against the title of the company. The company applied under section 84 of the Land Transfer Act, 1875, with the consent of the defendants, for an order modifying these conditions by reducing the minimum size and value of the houses. The company had mortgaged the purchased land, and had also sold off several plots to various purchasers, and the defendants had contracted to sell their remaining property. The consent of all parties, except the purchasers of three outlying plots, had been obtained.

Held, (1) that the court ought to accept the consent of the parties interested, if competent to consent, as sufficient proof within section 84 that modifications would be beneficial to them; (2) upon the evidence, that, in the absence of consent, this fact was not proved to the satisfaction of the court; (3) that all the persons who took with notice of the conditions were bound by them and were "persons principally interested" in the enforcement of them within the section, and that the order could only be made subject to their consent being obtained.

Observations as to the meaning of "persons principally interested."—GROUND RENT DEVELOPMENT CO. v. WEST, Ch.D. Kekewich, J.; [1902] 1 Ch. 674; 71 L. J. Ch. 354; 85 L. T. 403.

LANDLORD and TENANT:—

1. *Brewer's lease—Covenant to buy beer of lessors and "their successors in business"—Covenant running with the land—Lease executed by lessee only—Assignment of reversion—Breach of covenant—Injunction at suit of assignee—*32 Hen. 8, c. 34—Benefit of covenant a chose in action—Judicature Act, 1873 (36 & 37 Vict. c. 66), s. 25, sub-section 6—Conveyancing and Law of Property Act, 1881 (44 & 45 Vict. c. 41), ss. 10, 58.—In 1892 A. executed under seal an agreement to take an hotel as yearly tenant to B. & Co., and thereby covenanted to purchase all his beer of B. & Co. "and their successors in business." The covenant did not mention "assigns." B. & Co. did not execute the agreement, and there was nothing on the face of it to show that they were brewers. They were, in fact, brewers, and A. occupied the hotel under the agreement as their tenant and purchased beer of them.

In 1889 B. & Co. sold and conveyed their brewery, tied houses (including the hotel), and business to C. & Co., who were brewers, and who incorporated B. & Co.'s business with their own. After the sale B. & Co. ceased to carry on business. Notice of the change of ownership was given by C. & Co. to A., and for a time he purchased beer of them. In an action by C. & Co. to restrain A. from committing a breach of the covenant, Held, that the covenant was not personal to B. & Co., but ran with the land, and that C. & Co., as successors in business of B. & Co. and owners of the reversion in fee of the hotel, were entitled to the benefit of it.

Held, also, that C. & Co., as assigns of B. & Co., being clearly entitled against A. to specific performance of the agreement under which he was in possession of the hotel, could sue him on the covenant in the same manner as they could have done if B. & Co. had actually executed the original agreement.

Clegg v. Hands, (1890) 44 Ch. D. 503, and Walsh v. Lonsdale, (1882) 21 Ch. D. 9, followed.

Semble, the benefit of the covenant was a chose in action, assignable in equity before the Judicature Act, 1873, and by virtue of section 25, sub-section 6, of that Act the covenant could, after an absolute assignment thereof in writing and due notice given, be sued upon by the assignee.—MANCHESTER BREWERY CO. v. COOMBS, Ch.D. Farwell, J.; [1901] 2 Ch. 608; 70 L. J. Ch. 814.

2. Covenant to pay "rates, taxes, assessments, and outgoings"—Paving expenses—Public Health Act, 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 55), s. 150.—Apportioned paving expenses under the Public Health Act, 1875, which the landlord has paid, can be recovered from the tenant, where the latter has covenanted to pay all rates, taxes, assessments, and outgoings payable, or to become payable, whether by the landlord or tenant, in respect of the premises.—WELD v. CLAYTON-LE-MOORS DISTRICT COUNCIL, K.B.D.; 86 L. T. 584.

3. Demise—Nature of tenancy—Construction of agreement—Weekly rent—"Rent not to be raised" during continuance of lessor's interest—On the 11th of January, 1900, a shop was demised to the plaintiff under a written agreement as follows: "I shall be pleased to accept you as tenant for barber's shop at the rental of seven shillings per week, the rent not to be raised during my present tenancy."

The landlord was the lessee of the shop under a lease which would expire on the 24th of June, 1901.

Held (reversing the decision of Ridley, J.), that the plaintiff was not a mere tenant from week to week, but was entitled to a term which would expire on the 24th of June, 1901.—ADAMS v CAIRNS, C.A.; 85 L. T. 10.

4. Distress—Exemption from distress—Machine on hire-purchase agreement—Estoppel—Substitution of complainant in summons.—A sewing machine in the possession of a tenant under a hire-purchase agreement, and used by the tenant's wife to support the family, is exempt from distress, under section 4 of the Law of Distress Amendment Act, 1888, as a tool and implement of the trade of such tenant. Upon a distraint being made upon such a sewing machine, and a man being put in possession, a letter was written to the landlord: "I hereby request you to remove the sewing machine and other goods you have distrained on my premises."

Held, that this did not estop the respondent from raising the question whether the machine could be distrained upon at all.

Semble, that although the husband was the tenant and the hirer, the proceeding could be maintained by the wife, but that in any case the proceedings could be put right, either by having fresh proceedings or substituting the husband for the wife as complainant.—MASTERS v. FRASER, K.B.D.; 85 L. T. 611.

5. Lease—Covenant—Breach—Assigns—Underlessee of assign—Absolute covenant by lessee—Liability of assigns for default of underlessee.—The owner of a licensed public-house demised the same for a term of years to a lessee who covenanted for himself and his assigns that he "the lessee will at all times during the continuance of this demise" so conduct the house as to afford no reasonable ground for the justices refusing to renew the licence or objecting to the renewal of the same. The lessee assigned the lease to assignees, who afterwards sublet the house to a tenant from year to year. The tenant, while occupier and licensee of the house, committed breaches of the Licensing Acts for which he was convicted, and the value of the house as a licensed house was in consequence diminished, though the licence had not been indorsed.

Held, that the covenant by the lessee was an absolute covenant, and that the assigns of the lessee and the trustees of the will of the lessee, who had died, were liable in damages to the lessor for the acts and defaults of the tenant, the underlessee of the assigns.—MUMFORD v. WALKER, K.B.D.; 71 L. J. K. B. 19; 85 L. T. 518.

6. Lease—Covenant against assignment—Fishing, demise of exclusive right of—Lease—Construction—Grant by lessee of limited licence to fish.—By an indenture of lease the defendant demised to the plaintiff the exclusive right of fishing in a certain portion of the river, "together with full liberty of ingress, egress, and regress for the said lessee and his authorized friends at all times" during the term thereby granted "to fish with rods and lines in a proper and sportsmanlike manner . . . and the fish which they shall then and there take to have and retain to his and their own use." The lessee covenanted that he would not during the term "underlet, assign, transfer, or set over, or otherwise by any act or deed procure the said premises to be assigned, transferred, or set over unto any person or persons whomsoever" without the consent in writing of the lessor, his heirs or assigns.

Held, that, as the covenant did not extend to "any part" of the premises, the lessee was not precluded from granting a licence to another person (limited to two rods) to fish in the river during the residue of the term granted by the lease.

7. Lease—Covenant not to assign a lease without consent of lessor—Injunction.—A covenant by a lessee not to assign without the lessor's consent runs with the land, and applies to a reassignment to the original lessee. An injunction will lie on a threat to commit a breach of it.

8. Lease—Covenant by lessee to pay taxes, rates, and impositions—Expenses of abating nuisance—Public Health (London) Act, 1891 (54 & 55 Vict. c. 76), s. 4.—A lease of premises for a term of years contained a covenant by the lessee to "pay and discharge all taxes, rates, including sewers, main drainage assessments, and impositions whatsoever which now are or which at any time or times hereafter during the continuance of the said term hereby granted may be taxed, rated, assessed, charged, or imposed upon or in respect of the said premises, or any part thereof, on the landlord, tenant, or occupier of the same premises by authority of Parliament or otherwise howsoever (landlord's property tax and tithe only excepted)." There was no covenant to repair either by lessor or lessee. During the continuance of the term a notice was served on the lessor, under section 4 of the Public Health (London) Act, 1891, requiring him to abate a nuisance arising on the premises, and for that purpose to execute certain structural alterations, and he duly complied therewith.

Held, that the lessor was entitled, under the covenant, to recover from the lessee the expenses incurred in complying with the notice.

9. Lease—Lease of theatre—Covenant not to assign—Grant of right to supply refreshments—Breach of covenant.—The lessee of a theatre covenanted "not to assign, demise, or otherwise part with the indenture" of lease "or any estate or interest therein" without the licence of the lessor. Subsequently the lessee granted to a third person the free and exclusive licence and right to use the refreshment-rooms and bars in the theatre.

Held, that his so doing was not any breach of the covenant.

Decision of the Court of Appeal (sub. nom. Daly v. Edwardes, 49 W. R. 244). affirmed.—EDWARDES v. BARRINGTON, H.L., 358; 85 L. T. 650.

10. Lease—Light—Covenant not to object to adjoining buildings — "Adjoining" — "Neighbouring."—Where a lessee covenanted not to object to any works to adjoining premises,

Held, that "adjoining" did not mean "neighbouring," but was used in the sense of "in physical contact with."

11. Lease—Re-entry on liquidation, condition for—Limited company—Solvent company—Voluntary liquidation—Forfeiture—Bankruptcy — Conveyancing and Law of Property Act. 1881 (44 & 45 Vict. c. 41), s. 2, sub-section 15; s. 14, sub-section 6.—A proviso in a lease for re-entry, if the lessees being a company should enter into liquidation either compulsory or voluntary, applies to the case of a solvent company going into voluntary liquidation for the purpose of reconstruction or amalgamation only, and is "a condition for forfeiture on the bankruptcy of the lessee" within the Conveyancing and Law of Property Act, 1881, s. 14, sub-section 6.

The decisions of Kekewich, J., and the Court of Appeal ([1901] 1 Ch. 499) affirmed as to these points.

Horsey Estates (Limited) v. Steiger, [1899] 2 Q. B. 79, approved as to these points.—FRYER v. EWART, H.L.; [1902] A. C. 187; 71 L. J. Ch. 433; 86 L. T. 242.

12. Lease—"Subject to a three months' notice on either side at any time to terminate this agreement"—Such notice given between dates when rent was payable—Validity.—By an agreement of tenancy dated the 15th of May, 1895, the plaintiff let to the defendants certain licensed premises "from the 1st day of May, 1895 at a yearly rent of £40, payable every three months in advance if required, on the 1st day of May, the 1st day of August, the 1st day of November, and the 1st day of February in each year, the first payment being due and payable on the 1st day of May, subject to three months' notice on either side at any time to terminate this agreement.

Notice to quit was given on the 24th of January, 1901, in the following terms: "I hereby give you three months' notice and require you to quit and deliver up to me or my assigns on the 25th of April, 1901, all that messuage, &c."

Held, that the notice was good under the terms of the agreement, and that it was not necessary for the validity of the notice that it should be a notice to terminate the tenancy on one of the quarter days named. — SOAMES v. NICHOLSON, K.B.D., 169; [1902] 1 K. B. 157; 71 L. J. K. B. 24; 85 L. T. 614.

13. Mortgage—Sub-demise—Receiver—Liability of receiver for rent and damages—A receiver appointed by the court on behalf of mortgagees of leasehold property by way of sub-demise, who has gone into possession, is under no liability to pay to the lessor rent due under the lease out of funds coming to hand during his occupation of the premises. A receiver in such a case is in exactly the same position as the mortgagees would have been in had they gone into possession, and no special right arises against him in favour of the landlord by reason of his position as an officer of the court.—HAND v. BLOW C.A., 5; [1901] 2 Ch. 271; 70 L. J. Ch. 687; 85 L. T. 156.

14. Notice to quit—Tenancy from year to year—Service by registered letter—Agricultural Holdings (England) Act 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 61), ss. 28. 33. —Section 28 of the Agricultural Holdings (England) Act, 1883, by which a notice under the Act may be served by sending it through the post in a registered letter, applies to a notice to quit in the case of a tenancy from year to year, which by section 33 is required to be a year's instead of a half-year's notice.—VAN GRUTTEN v. TREVENEN, C.A., 516; [1902] 2 K. B. 82; 71 L. J. K. B. 544.

15. Renewal "at costs of lessee"—Costs of reference and award as to amount of fine payable on renewal—By a covenant for renewal in a lease for years the lessor covenanted at any time during the term, upon the request and "at the costs of the lessee," to renew the lease for a further term on payment of a fine calculated (in part) upon the full improved annual value of the premises at the time of renewal, such value to be determined by the landlord's surveyor or, at the option of the lessee, by the award of two referees or their umpire. The lessee having required a renewal of the lease, and the parties being unable to agree as to the amount of the fine, the question of the improved annual value of the premises at the time of the renewal was referred to two referees or their umpire, and the umpire made an award.

Held, that the costs of the renewal which were to be paid by the lessee were the ordinary conveyancing costs only, such as the costs of drawing, settling, and completing the new lease, and that they did not include the costs of the reference and award, which were in the discretion of the umpire. —MOSTYN v. FITZSIMMONS, K.B.D.; [1902] 1 K. B. 512; 71 L. J. K. B. 89.

16. Sporting rights—Licence—Notice of determination—Reasonable notice—A landlord, by an agreement not under seal, dated the 14th of May, 1895, let sporting rights for a certain rent over his lands to two tenants, A. and B., for the term of one year, and by a subsequent letter, dated the 31st of December. 1895, agreed to a reduction of the "annual" rent. A. and B. continued to enjoy the shooting rights for six years, paying the rent agreed upon. Shortly before the sixth year was up A. and B. were, first verbally and subsequently by written notice, informed that the arrangement would be revoked as from the end of the sixth year. The landlord then let the shooting rights as from the latter date to C. exclusively. A. and B., however, insisted on exercising sporting rights over the lands, alleging that they should have had six months' notice of the determination of the tenancy. In an action brought by C. for an injunction to restrain A. and B. from shooting over the lands, Held, that the rules, as to notice, applicable to a tenancy of corporeal hereditaments do not necessarily apply to incorporeal hereditaments, and that reasonable notice had been given.—LOWE v. ADAMS. Ch.D. Cozens-Hardy, J., 37; [1901] 2 Ch. 598; 70 L. J. Ch. 783; 85 L. T. 195.

LANDS CLAUSES ACT:—

1. Compensation—Lands Clauses Act, 1845 (8 & 9 Vict. c. 18), s. 121—Tenant from year to year—Jurisdiction of magistrate—Possession.—The justices, where a claim has been made for compensation under the Lands Clauses Compensation Act, have no power to inquire into the claimant's title, but it is a condition precedent to any claim that the claimant shall have been required to give up possession of lands occupied by him.—GREAT NORTHERN AND CITY RAILWAY CO v. TILLETT, K.B.D., 652; [1902] 1 K. B. 874; 71 L. J. K. B. 525; 86 L. T. 723.

2. Compulsory taking lands—Compensation—Coal mine—Notice to treat—Subsequent rise in price of coal—Basis of assessment.—Where a notice to treat has been given under the Lands Clauses Act, 1845, for the assessment of compensation payable in respect of certain seams of coal which a waterworks company requires the coal owner to leave unworked, the arbitrator is not entitled to take into consideration, in assessing the compensation, a rise in the value of coal which has taken place subsequently to the date of the notice to treat.

Judgment of the Divisional Court (ante, p. 135, [1901] 2 K. B. 798) reversed.—BWLLFA, &c., STEAM COLLIERIES AND PONTYPRIDD WATERWORKS, RE, C.A., 627; [1902] 2 K. B. 135; 71 L. J. K. B. 613.

3. Compulsory taking of land—Notice to treat—Interest created by owner in adjoining land subsequently to date of notice—Injurious affection of such land—Right to compensation—Land Clauses Act, 1845 (8 Vict. c. 18), s. 68.—The defendants, under their statutory powers, served a notice to treat on the owner of certain land. After the date of this notice the owner leased certain adjoining land, not included in the notice to treat, to the predecessor in title of the plaintiff for a long term of years. Subsequent to such lease an agreement was made between the owner and the defendants in respect of the land included in the notice to treat, and compensation paid to the owner for all damage sustained by him by reason of the severing of the property purchased from him from his other property, or otherwise injuriously affecting such other property. Owing to the execution of certain works by the defendants the plaintiff's property was injuriously affected.

Held, that the plaintiff, although his predecessor's title was created after the date of the notice to treat, was entitled to claim compensation for the injurious affection of his interest in the property.

The service of a notice to treat does not prevent the owner of the property to which the notice to treat relates dealing with property other than that included in the notice, and persons who bonâ fide acquire interest in such other property are not deprived of their claim to compensation for injurious affection by works subsequently executed simply because, after the date of the creation of their interest, an agreement has been made between the purchaser and the owner whereby the owner has been paid compensation for the land taken and for the injurious affection of his own property.—MERCER v. LIVERPOOL AND SOUTH LANCASHIRE RAILWAY CO., K.B.D. 155; [1901] 2 K. B. 753; 70 L. J. K. B. 775; 85 L. T. 283.

4. Injuriously affecting land—Breach of restrictive covenant—Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845 (8 Vict. c. 18), s. 68.—Where a railway company, having taken land under its compulsory powers, does an act which amounts to a breach of a restrictive covenant imposed for the benefit of adjoining land, such breach may be the subject-matter of compensation for injuriously affecting the adjaintng land, under section 68 of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845.

LIBEL:—

Action for—Practice—Pleas of justification and privilege—Defendant successful on one and unsuccessful on the other—Costs of witnesses relating exclusively to plea on which defendant unsuccessful.—Where in an action for libel pleas of justification and privilege are set up, and the defendant fails to establish the plea of justification, and judgment is given for him on the plea of privilege, the plaintiff is not entitled to the costs of witnesses whose evidence does not relate exclusively to the plea of justification.—BROWN v. HOUSTON, C.A.; [1901] 2 K. LICENSING LAW:—

1. Club—Sale of liquor to agent of member—Licensing Act, 1872 (35 & 36 Vict. c. 94), s. 3.—A member of a bonâ fide club purchased at the club, by means of an agent, a bottle containing intoxicating liquor to be consumed off the premises. The club has no licence to sell intoxicating liquors.

Held (following Graff v. Evans, 30 W. R. 380, 8 Q. B. D. 373), that there was no sale within the meaning of the Licensing Act, 1872.—DAVIES v. BURNETT, K.B.D., 391; [1902] 1 K. B. 666; 71 L. J. K. B. 355; 86 L. T. 565.

2. Licensed person—Licensing Act, 1872 (35 & 36 Vict. c. 94), ss. 3, 17.—The executor of a deceased licence-holder carrying on the business is himself a licence-holder within the meaning of the Licensing Act, 1872.—MACDONALD v. HUGHES, K.B.D., 318; [1902] 1 K. B. 94; 71 L. J. K. B. 43; 85 L. T. 727.

3. Objections by justices—No objection taken at meeting—Adjournment—Refusal of renewal—Jurisdiction—Mandamus—Form of.—Where no notice of objection has been served not less than seven clear days before the commencement of the general licensing meeting any objection then made under section 42 (2) of the Licensing Act, 1872, must be made in open court before the adjournment, otherwise, when the justices deal with the renewal upon the adjournment, they will have no jurisdiction except to renew the licence. An objection can be made under section 42 (2) at the general annual licensing meeting by the justices themselves, but such objection must be made in open court. The court will not by mandamus order a judicial tribunal to act in a particular way unless it is quite plain that what it has to do is purely ministerial and not judicial. Therefore, a mandamus will not be granted to justices to hold a further adjournment of the general annual licensing meeting, and at such further adjournment grant a renewal of a licence, but it will merely order the justices to hear and determine according to law.—REX v. JUSTICES OF KINGSTON, DAVEY, EX PARTE, K.B.D.; 86 L. 4. Public-house—Right to refuse entry—Licensing Act, 1872, s. 18.—The occupier of licensed premises (other than an inn) may request any customer to leave the premises, even though he be not drunk, quarrelsome, violent, or disorderly.—SEALEY v. TANDY, K.B.D., 347; [1902] 1 K. 5. Transfer—Off-licence—Condition of original grant that if licensee retired, licence should not be renewed—Application for transfer—Jurisdiction of magistrates to entertain application—Beerhouse Act, 1830 (11 Geo. 4 and 1 Will. 4, c. 64).—An off-licence was granted to the occupier of a grocer's shop upon the condition that the licence should be given up upon the applicant leaving or ceasing to carry on the grocery business upon the premises. The licensee sold his business, and the purchaser applied to the licensing justices for a transfer of the licence to him.

The justices refused to grant the transfer, on the ground that they were debarred from so doing by the condition upon which the licence was granted.

Held, that the condition was not an absolute bar to the transfer of the licence, but only a matter to be taken into consideration when considering whether or no in their discretion they would grant the transfer.—GEE v. OLDHAM JUSTICES, K.B.D., 394; 86 L. T. 389.

LIMITATIONS, STATUTE OF:—

1. Action on judgment—Part payment—Bankruptcy—Release—Real Property Limitation Act, 1874 (37 & 38 Vict. c. 57), s. 8.—A plaintiff in 1884 obtained judgment in the English courts for £15,067. He afterwards obtained judgment in the courts of the South African Republic for £9,335 in respect of the same debt, and received the latter sum in full under the defendant's bankruptcy.

Held, that his judgment in the English court was now barred by the Real Property Limitation Act, 1874, and that it was not taken out of the statute by the payment under the bankruptcy proceedings in the South African courts, and that the judgment obtained there operated as a discharge of the original judgment debt.—TAYLOR v. HOLLARD, K.B.D., 558; [1902] 1 K. B. 676; 71 L. J. K. B. 278; 86 L. T. 228.

2. Land tax—Redemption—Yearly sum paid by way of interest—Charge on premises—Land Tax Redemption Act, 1802 (42 Geo. 3, c. 116), ss. 123, 125—Real Property Limitation Act, 1833 (3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 27), s. 1—Real Property Limitation Act, 1874 (37 & 38 Vict. c. 57), ss. 1, 8.—By section 123 of the Land Tax Redemption Act, 1802, it is provided that where any person having any estate or interest (other than an estate of inheritance) in any lands, tenements, or hereditaments, shall redeem the land tax charged thereon, such lands, tenements, or hereditaments shall be chargeable for his benefit with the amount of the moneys paid as the consideration for the redemption of such land tax, and with the payment of a yearly sum of money by way of interest thereon, equal in amount to the land tax redeemed. Such "yearly sum" is either "rent," within the meaning of section 1 of the Real Property Limitation Act, 1874, or the principal sum is a "sum of money charged upon or payable out of land," within the meaning of section 8 of that Act, and, therefore, an action to recover such yearly sum is barred by the said sections unless brought within the time thereby limited.—SKEEE v. COOK, C.A., 506; [1902] 1 K. B. 682; 71 L. J. K. B 446; 86 L. T. 319.

3. Leaseholds—User of adjoining land—Accretion to holding—Statute of Limitations (3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 27), s. 7.—A. was the tenant of two plots of land from the same landlord. He executed in his lifetime a deed directing that after his death the two plots should be held by the trustees on different trusts. He died in 1848. The cestui que trustent of the one plot used and occupied the other plots without acknowledgment or payment of rent for over forty years.

Held, that their occupation was not that of trespasser or tenant at will, but was under the trusts of the will, and that consequently the Statute of Limitations did not run as against the landlord.—EAST STONEHOUSE LOCAL BOARD v. WILLOUGHBY, K.B.D., 698.

5. Real Property—Action to recover land—Person under disability—Claim by husband in right of wife—Real Property Limitation Acts (3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 27), ss. 16, 17, 34; 37 & 38 Vict. c. 57, ss. 3, 5)—Will—Construction—Gift of "all the shares of my late husband's estate"—Real estate, whether passed.—B. died intestate in December, 1869, possessed of copyholds held of the manor of Taunton Dene, which by the custom of that manor devolved upon his widow. He left surviving him, besides his widow, his son P. and two daughters, of whom one was the plaintiff, Mrs. H. The widow died on the 7th of January, 1870, having by her will devised to her two daughters "the share of her late husband's estate" that she took or was entitled to on his decease, to be divided between them, share and share alike. She also gave them pecuniary legacies, and declared that she made this provision for them in lieu of the freehold and copyhold lands which descended to her son on the intestacy of her husband; and she appointed H., the husband of Mrs. H., to be her executor. On her death it was erroneously assumed that the Taunton Dene copyholds had, upon B.'s death, devolved upon P. as his customary heir, and from that time the rents were collected by H., and applied to the maintenance of P. until he attained twenty-one, in 1878, when H. accounted to him and handed over the title-deeds. P. continued in possession till his death in 1890, having devised all his real estate to the defendants. The facts as to the devolution of the copyholds on B.'s death having been discovered, on the 25th of September, 1900, an action was brought by Mrs. H. and her husband in her right for a declaration that they were entitled to a moiety of the copyholds under the will of B.'s widow,

Held, assuming that the copyholds passed under the will, that inasmuch as P. had been in possession through H. from the death of the widow, the action was barred by section 5 of the Real Property Act, 1874, it not having been brought within thirty years of the 7th of January, 1870, when the plaintiff's right first accrued; but,

Semble, on the construction of the will, the copyholds did not pass thereunder.—HOUNSELL v. DUNNING, Ch.D. Joyce, J.; [1902] 1 Ch. 512; 71 L. J. Ch. 259; 86 L. T. 382.

LOCAL GOVERNMENT:—

1. Building erected in contravention of bye-law—Continuing offence—Sale of building—Liability of purchaser—Public Health Act, 1888 (51 & 52 Vict. c. 52), s. 3.—A purchaser of a building erected in contravention of the Public Health Act, 1888, s. 3, who allows it to remain in the same state after written notice from the urban authority, is not a "person offending" against the enactment, and cannot be convicted of allowing the offence to continue.—BLACKPOOL CORPORATION v. JOHNSON, K.B.D.; [1902] 1 K. B. 646; 71 L. J. K. B. 485.

2. Bye-laws—Infringement—Erection of houses abutting on public highway—Laying out new street—Injunction—Special remedy—Proceedings before justices—Jurisdiction—Urban authority.—The defendants were the owners of a triangular piece of land within the plaintiffs' borough. Two sides of the triangle abutted upon public highways within the borough. The defendants, in pursuance of a building scheme, erected houses on their land fronting the highways. The plaintiffs alleged that the defendants were laying out the highways as new streets which did not comply with the requirements of the borough bye-laws as to width, and they claimed, first, an injunction, and, secondly, a declaration that the plaintiffs were entitled to remove or pull down any work begun or done by the defendants in contravention of the by-laws. The bye-laws, which were framed under the Public Health Act, 1875, prescribed a penalty for infringement, to be recovered by summary proceedings, and provided that the plaintiffs might, subject to any statutory provision in that behalf, remove, alter, or pull down any work begun or done in contravention of the bye-laws.

Held, (1) that the defendants were not laying out or intending to lay out the highways as new streets within the meaning of the bye-laws; (2) that the by-laws could not be enforced by action for an injunction, but only by the special remedies thereby provided, or by way of information by the Attorney-General; and (3) that no such declaration as asked for ought to be made.—DEVONPORT CORPORATION v. TOZER, *Ch.D. 3. Bye-laws—Power to make bye-laws for regulating sale of articles on beach—Bye-law forbidding sale except under agreement—Validity—Local Government Board's Provisional Orders Confirmation (No. 10) Act, 1890 (53 & 54 Vict. c. clxxix.), s. 1, and Schedule.—Under statutory powers enabling a corporation to make bye-laws for regulating the selling or hawking of any article on their beach and foreshore, the corporation make a bye-law that: "A person shall not on the said beach or foreshore sell or hawk or offer or expose for sale any article, commodity, or thing, except in pursuance of an agreement with the corporation, and in such part or parts of the beach and foreshore as the corporation shall by notice affixed or set up thereon from time to time appoint for the purpose."

Held, that the bye-law was unreasonable and bad on the ground that it gave the corporation power to make any agreement they chose without reference to the question of the reasonableness or unreasonableness of such agreement, and that it reserved to them a right to refuse to give a licence to any particular person.—PARKER v. BOURNEMOUTH CORPORATION, K.B.D.; 86 L. 4. Bye-law prohibiting wilful annoyance of passengers in the streets—Validity—Uncertainty.—A bye-law made by a municipal corporation for the good rule and government of their borough provided that "No person shall wilfully annoy passengers in the streets"; and other bye-laws made at the same time dealt with particular kinds of annoyances in the streets.

Held, that the bye-law was void for uncertainty.—NASH v. FINLAY, K.B.D.; 85 L. T. 682.

5. District council—Parliamentary opposition—Expenses of opposition—Application of district rate—Ratepayers' consent—Sanction of Local Government Board—Borough Funds Act, 1872 (35 & 36 Vict. c. 91), ss. 2, 4, 8, 10—Local Authorities (Expenses) Act, 1887 (50 & 51 Vict. c. 72), s. 3.—An urban district council cannot apply the district rate towards payment of the expenses of opposing a local Bill not affecting their own duties, rights, or privileges, without first obtaining the consent of the ratepayers under section 4 of the Borough Funds Act, 1872, nor is section 3 of the Local Authorities (Expenses) Act, 1887, under which such expenses if incurred may be sanctioned by the Local Government Board, intended to prevent the court from intervening to restrain such expenses being thrown on the rate when the sanction of the Local Government Board has not been applied for.—ATTORNEY-GENERAL v. RICKMANSWORTH DISTRICT COUNCIL, *Ch.D. 10. Rating—Appeal—Charges incurred more than six months before rate—Right of appeal—Public Health Act, 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 55), ss. 210, 218—A ratepayer applied to quash a rate on the ground that it included expenditure more than six months before the striking of the rate, contrary to section 210 of the Public Health Act, 1875.

Held, that a primâ facie right of appeal lay, and that it had not been taken away by section 218 of the Act.—SMITH v. SOUTHAMPTON CORPORATION, K.B.D., 651; [1902] 2 K. B. 244; 71 L. J. K. B. 639.

11. Rating—Empty warehouse—Occupation—Intention—Liability to rates.—From a date prior to the making of certain rates the respondents gave notice to the appellants that they intended to keep certain warehouses unoccupied during the current overseers' year, and to claim exemption from the rates in respect thereof.

All goods had been removed before the making of the rate, and the warehouses had not been used since that date, though they were advertised in the list of warehouses to let belonging to the respondents. Each warehouse was one of a block, through which continuous shafting passed, and at the end of the block was a notice: "For storage, apply to the L. W. Company."

A warehouse in respect of which notice had been given to the appellants was still advertised on the cards issued by the respondents, and they had tried to let it by notice affixed on the warehouse.

Held, that the justices were justified in coming to the conclusion that there was no occupation of these warehouses so as to render the respondents liable to be rated in respect thereof.—BOOTLE OVERSEERS v. LIVERPOOL WAREHOUSING CO., K.B.D.; 85 L. T. 45

Held, that, in accordance with section 4 of the London Government Act, 1899, the London and India Docks Co. were still entitled to that exemption although Woolwich is now governed by the Metropolis Management Act, 1855 (18 & 19 Vict. c. 120).

Held, also, that the appellants were entitled to appeal against the amount of the rate—LONDON AND INDIA DOCKS CO. v. WOOLWICH, K B.D., 639; [1902] 1 K. B. 750; 71 L. J. K. B. 394; 86 L. T. 619.

13. Rating—Sewage farm—Lease to tenant—Sewage works on farm—Occupation by sewerage board.—The S. M. D. Board acquired a sewage farm, and laid down thereon certain carriers and other sewage works and plant.

They leased the farm to one C., reserving the right of entry thereon for the purpose of constructing, maintaining, altering, and repairing the works as might be requisite for using the farm as a sewage farm.

C. was to irrigate by means of the works on the farm, and was to keep the pipes and carriers properly flushed and cleaned.

The board kept the works in repair, and from time to time their surveyor and agents went on the land to see that the sewage was properly distributed and treated, and to do repairs.

Held, that the board were rightly held not to be in occupation of these carriers and other sewage works and plant, and so not legally rateable in respect thereof.—STOURBRIDGE MAIN DRAINAGE BOARD v. SEISDON UNION, K.B.D.; 86 L. T. 415.

14. Sewering and paving streets—Apportionment of expenses amongst frontagers—Exemption—Volunteer headquarters—Premises owned and occupied by servants of the Crown for Crown purposes—Public Health Act, 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 55), s. 327—The respondent purchased the fee simple of certain land for the purpose of it being transferred to and used by a volunteer corps, and pursuant to the provisions of the Military Lands Act, 1892, he mortgaged the premises to the Public Works Loan Commissioners for a sum of money which was applied in repaying the respondent the purchase price of the premises and in fitting them up for the use of the corps. The respondent had no use or occupation of the premises otherwise than as commanding officer of the corps.

Held, that there was an ownership and an occupation of the premises on behalf of the Crown for Crown purposes, and, therefore, that the respondent was not liable under section 150 of the Public Health Act, 1875, to contribute towards the expense of sewering and paving the street on which the premises fronted.

The principle that Acts of Parliament do not impose pecuniary burdens upon Crown property, unless the Crown is expressly named or unless by necessary implication the Crown has agreed to be bound, was applicable in this case.—HORNSEY URBAN DISTRICT COUNCIL v. HENNELL, K.B.D., 521; [1902] 2 K. 15. Solicitor—Retainer by corporation—Retainer not under seal—Subsequent confirmation under seal—Provisional order—Dissolution of local authority—Transfer of liability for costs to other local authorities.—The Corporation of T., having presented a memorial to the Local Government Board asking for the inclusion within their borough of the Urban District of C., the district council of C., resolved to oppose it, and by resolutions passed from time to time retained the plaintiffs, a firm of solicitors and Parliamentary agents, for that purpose. The resolutions were not under seal, but subsequently, and after the plaintiffs had done a considerable amount of work under them, the seal of the district council was affixed to the resolutions. An inquiry having been held, a provisional order was made by the Local Government Board, which was afterwards confirmed, the effect of which was to dissolve the C. district, and to add part of it to the borough of T. and the other part to the rural district of N. The plaintiffs' bill of costs in respect of the Parliamentary opposition to the confirmation of the provisional order was delivered to the district council of C. and afterwards to the defendants. In an action brought by the plaintiffs to recover the amount of such bill from the defendants,

Held, that the confirmation under seal of the original retainers created an obligation binding upon the district council of C. without any new consideration, and that it was not ultra vires for them to create such an obligation.

Held, also, that the costs in question were costs authorized by section 298 of the Public Health Act, 1875, and were not subject to the requirements of the Municipal Corporations (Borough Funds) Act, 1872, and that, upon the construction of the provisional order, the defendants were liable to pay them in such proportions as might be awarded under section 62 of the Local Government Act, 1888 —BROOKS v. TORQUAY CORPORATION, K.B.D.; [1902] 1 K. B. 601; 71 L. J. K. B. 109; 85 L. T. 785.

16 Street—Arch built under carriage-way—Cross-action—Injunction to restrain interference with electric cables.—W. R. & Co. were occupiers of land on both sides of F.-street within the urban district of which the W. U. D. C. was the urban authority. In April, 1901, W. R. & Co. constructed a tunnel or culvert twelve feet beneath the carriage-way of F.-street for the purpose of carrying electric cables in connection with their business. The tunnel consisted of a concrete flooring and a brick archway. They subsequently changed their plans, and, cutting through the concrete, laid the cables in pipes upon or nearly upon the clay subsoil, and filled in the flooring with fresh concrete. The W. U. D. C. gave them notice to remove the tunnel in accordance with section 26 of the Public Health Act, 1875. W. R. & Co. then removed the keystone of the arch, the tunnel fell in, and the subsidence was made good with ballast. The W. U. D. C., not being satisfied, brought an action claiming a declaration that they, as the urban authority, might properly cause the arch, vault, or cellar constructed by the defendants under the carriage-way of F.-street to be altered, pulled down, or otherwise dealt with as the W. U. D. C. should think fit. W. R. & Co. instituted a cross-action for an injunction to prevent the W. U. D. C. from cutting, disturbing, or injuring their pipes or electrical wires. The two actions came on together. It was argued on behalf of the W. U. D. C. that they had a right to remove the structure, including the pipes and wires.

Held, that the pipes were not in any part of the structure, and that the W. U. D. C. were entitled to remove the structure, which they must do without injuring the pipes or wires.—WALKER URBAN DISTRICT COUNCIL v. WIGHAM, Ch.D. Farwell, J.; 85 L. T. 579.

17. Street—Fee simple of road—Vesting in local authority—Electric light company—Overhead wires—Public Health Act, 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 55) s. 149 —General Turnpike Act, 1822 (3 Geo. 4, c. 126), s. 84 —A strip of land was acquired in 1828 in fee simple by trustees under the General Turnpike Act, 1822, for the purpose of making a public road. In 1872 the turnpikes were removed from the road, and from 1878 onwards the Finchley Local Board and its successors, the Finchley Urban District Council, maintained the said road. In 1901 an electric light company carried their wires across the road, and the urban district council caused these wires to be cut. The electric light company now brought an action for an injunction to restrain the district council from interfering with their wires.

Held, that the legal estate in the road lay in the real representative of the surviving trustee of the original conveyance in 1828, who held for the local authority, and that the land in fee simple had been in this case acquired and still was required for the purposes of the street, and consequently the action was dismissed.—FINCHLEY ELECTRIC LIGHT CO. v. FINCHLEY URBAN DISTRICT COUNCIL, *Ch.D. 18. Tramway—Bye-law—Validity.—A tramway company, in a town where the Town Police Clauses Act, 1847, was in operation, made the following bye-law: "No person shall swear or use obscene or offensive language whilst in or upon any carriage."

Held, that the bye-law was not invalid because it did not contain the words "to the annoyance of the passengers"; and that a local authority has the power of defining what shall be deemed a nuisance under particular circumstances, and can deal with such by means of a bye-law.

19. Tolls—Bicycle—"Carriage."—By a local Act tolls were imposed on "every coach, chariot, hearse," &c., and every other carriage hung on springs the sum of 6d. for each wheel, and for each horse or other beast of draught drawing the same 2d."; and "for every waggon," &c., "or other such like carriage, with or without springs, the sum of 6d. per wheel, and for each horse or other beast of draught drawing the same the sum of 2d."

Held, without deciding whether or no it was a "carriage hung on springs," that a bicycle was not a carriage within this section, as it only referred to carriages drawn by horses or other beasts of draught.—SIMPSON v. TEIGNMOUTH BRIDGE CO., K.B.D.; 85 L. T. 726.

20. Transfer of areas—Severance of part of district—Constitution of new district—Adjustment of liabilities—Adjustment and agreement as to existing accounts—Right to claim subsequent adjustment for loss by severance.—By an order made by a county council under section 57 of the Local Government Act, 1888, a part of a rural district was severed from the district and constituted a new urban district, and all necessary adjustments were to be made in accordance with the provisions of section 68 of the Local Government Act, 1894. An adjustment of accounts was then made and an agreement entered into between the councils providing for the payment of certain sums in respect of matters therein specified, and these sums were paid. Subsequently the rural council, finding that the severance was a pecuniary loss to them, requested the urban council to come to an agreement as to the amount to be paid for such loss, but the councils were unable to agree, and an arbitrator was appointed to determine the question of adjustment of the financial loss sustained by the rural district by the severance of the urban district, in so far as such loss was not determined by the prior agreement. No claim for such loss was included in the prior agreement.

Held, that the adjustment claimed by the rural council was an adjustment within the meaning of section 68 of the Local Government Act, 1894, although the severed portion had been formed into an urban district of itself and had not been transferred to an existing district; and further, that the claim to have such adjustment was not barred by the prior agreement between the councils.—ST. THOMAS RURAL COUNCIL AND HEAVITREE URBAN COUNCIL, RE, K.B.D.; 86 L. T. 153.

21. Transference of duties of clerk of the peace—Reduction in fees—Existing officer—Compensation—"Not less salaries or remuneration."—By section 119, sub-section 1, of the Local Government Act, 1888, "The officers and servants of the quarter sessions, or general assessment sessions, or justices, or any committee of such sessions or justices . . . who held office at the passing of this Act, and who by virtue of this Act become officers and servants of a county council (in this Act referred to as existing officers), shall hold their offices upon the same tenure and upon the same terms and conditions as if this Act had not been passed, and while performing the same duties, shall not receive less salaries or remuneration . . . than they would have if this Act had not been passed." The plaintiff, by virtue of section 118, sub-section 10, of that Act, being clerk of the peace of Surrey, continued to be clerk of the peace at the quarter sessions held for the county of London at Newington, and for the purpose of the business at those sessions he was deemed to be clerk of the peace for the county of London. The Middlesex scale of fees, which by section 115 was that taken in the county of London by the clerk of the peace, was lower than the Surrey scale, and the Middlesex scale was further reduced by the standing joint committee of the London County Council and the quarter sessions.

Held, that the plaintiff was only entitled, as clerk of the peace for the county of London for Newington, to the fees payable under the reduced scale in Middlesex; but that, by virtue of section 119, he was entitled to receive not less remuneration, whether by salary or by fees, than that to which he was entitled at the passing of the Local Government Act, 1888.—WYATT v. LONDON COUNTY COUNCIL, K.B.D.; 85 L. LOTTERY:—

Sale of chances—Proposal or scheme for sale of chances in newspaper—"Spot" competition in newspaper—Conviction.—It was announced in an issue of an evening newspaper belonging to a limited company and sold for the price of one halfpenny, that for a certain period in certain issues of the newspaper spots of various size and configuration would be printed in various parts of the issues. Some of such spots were distinguished as winning spots. It was also stated in the paper that on a specified day an announcement would appear in the paper showing the exact configuration of such spots as were declared to be winning spots; and it was stated in all the issues in question that the person who cut from the newspaper and sent to the offices of the same the portion of the newspaper containing any spot the facsimile of which had been declared to be a winning spot, would receive a prize. The winning spots were arbitrarily selected by the proprietors of the newspaper, and the winning of the prizes depended wholly upon chance. The appellant, the printer and publisher of the newspaper, was summoned under section 41 of the Lotteries Act, 1823 (4 Geo. 4, c. 60), for unlawfully publishing a proposal and scheme for the sale of chances in a lottery—namely, the proposal and scheme called "spots," and was convicted under the section as a rogue and vagabond.

Held, that the sale of the newspapers was the publishing a proposal and scheme for the sale of chances in a lottery, not authorized by any Act of Parliament within the meaning of the section, and that the appellant was properly convicted under the section.—HALL v. MCWILLIAM, K.B.D.; 85 L. MARKET:—

Franchise—Fair—Fair and market held on same day—Merger—Change of days for which charter granted—Tolls—Stallage.—The plaintiff, as lord of the manor of Worksop, was owner of a weekly provision and cattle market (held on Wednesdays) and two annual fairs granted by ancient charters with right of toll. The defendants were lessees of the markets under a lease granted in 1851 for ninety-nine years. This lease expressly excepted and reserved the fairs. In 1845 the then lord of the manor had, without licence from the Crown, changed the days of holding the fairs from the 21st of March and the 2nd and 3rd of October, the days named in the charter, to the second Wednesdays in March and October. Until the date of the lease the markets and fairs were held in the streets. After that date the markets were held in buildings or on land provided by the defendants or their predecessors in title. On the two new fair days the fair was duly proclaimed by the crier of the lord, but nothing further was done by the lord. On these fair days the defendants charged an increased toll for stalls in the market to persons who only attended on fair days, but allowed regular attendants at the market to have stalls at the usual market rate. The defendants had also issued lists of tolls showing an increased toll on fair days, for "lots" of eggs, but this had not been collected. The plaintiff brought this action for an account of all tolls received by the defendants on fair days on the ground that they were fair tolls and not market tolls. It appeared that tolls were taken at the fair in the reign of Edward III., but there was no evidence of the payment of any fair tolls between that date and the date of the lease.

Held, that there is no impossibility in holding a market and a fair in the same manor on the same day, and no presumption that the market is absorbed in the fair; that, though the change of days did not of itself forfeit the franchise of the fair, the lord could not legally recover tolls on days not named in the charter; that the increased tolls charged by the defendants on fair days were stallage payable to them as owners of the soil; that the owner of a fair or market, so long as he does not charge unreasonable tolls, is not bound to charge all persons alike, but may remit part of the toll to favoured persons; and that the parties had contracted for the lease upon the basis that no fair tolls were payable.—DUKE OF NEWCASTLE v. WORKSOP URBAN DISTRICT COUNCIL, Ch.D.

MARRIAGE.—See Probate, 8.

MARRIED WOMAN:—

1. Liability to costs—Separate estate—Restraint on anticipation—Claim by wife to goods seized for husband's debts—"Proceedings instituted"—County Court Rules, 1889, ord. 27, rr. 1, 2, 4 (a)—Married Women's Property Act, 1893 (56 & 57 Vict. c. 63), s. 2.—A married woman by notice in writing directed to the sheriff or high bailiff claimed certain goods levied on for her husband's debts under process of a county court. The high bailiff, in whose possession the goods were, thereupon took out an interpleader summons, and at the trial of the interpleader issue the claimant failed to establish her claim.

Held, that the proceedings were "instituted" by her within the meaning of section 2 of the Married Women's Property Act, 1893, and therefore that the court had jurisdiction to order her to pay the costs so incurred out of her separate estate subject to a restraint on anticipation, and to enforce payment thereof by the appointment of a receiver. —NUNN v. TYSON, K.B.D., 16; [1901] 2 K. B. 487; 70 L. J. K. B. 854; 85 L. T. 123.

2. Marriage settlement—Covenant to settle after-acquired property—Judicial separation—"During the marriage"—Matrimonial Causes Act, 1857 (20 & 21 Vict. c. 85), s. 25—Infant—Repudiation.—Property acquired by a wife after a decree of judicial separation does not fall within a covenant in a marriage settlement to settle property acquired "during the said intended marriage."

An infant who has executed a marriage settlement will not be allowed to repudiate it thirty years later upon the ground that she only became aware of its contents shortly before repudiation.—DAVENPORT v. MARSHALL, Ch.D Buckley. J., 39; [1902] 1 Ch. 82; 71 L. J. Ch. 29; 85 L. T. 340.

3. Settlement—Covenant to settle after-acquired property—Bequest to separate use subject to restraint on anticipation—"During the coverture"—Property acquired after decree of separation pronounced by foreign court—Marriage with foreigner—Domicil—Settlement in English form—Subject-matter of settlement in England.—Where a legacy is given to a married woman for her separate use absolutely, and by a subsequent clause in the will she is restrained from anticipation; inasmuch as she would, notwithstanding the restraint, be entitled to the interest on the legacy when the time for paying such interest arrived, the legacy is bound by a covenant to settle after-acquired property contained in her marriage settlement.

Where by the law of a foreign country a decree of judicial separation pronounced by a court in such country has no effect on the property rights of the husband and wife, property falling into possession after the pronouncement of the decree is bound by the covenant.

Davenport v. Marshall, ante, p. 39, [1902] 1 Ch. 82, distinguished.

On the marriage of an Englishwoman with an Italian property in England was made the subject of a settlement in English form. The settlement was executed by the intended husband and wife in Italy, where the marriage took place. By the law of Italy the settlement would have been invalid, not only through informalities attending its execution, but also because it contained dispositions of property prohibited by that law.

Held, that the settlement must be construed according to English law.

Held, also, that the covenant to settle after-acquired property on the trusts of the settlement was valid and could be enforced, even though by the law of the matrimonial domicil such trusts were illegal.

MARTIAL LAW:—

State of war—Ordinary tribunals—Jurisdiction of courts.—Where war actually prevails the ordinary courts have no jurisdiction over the action of the military authorities. Should martial law be proclaimed over certain districts, the civil courts, though permitted to continue for ordinary purposes, have no authority over the military tribunals.—MARAIS v. GENERAL OFFICER COMMANDING IN SOUTH AFRICA, P.C., 273; [1902] A. C. 109; 71 L. J. P. C. 42; 85 L. T. 734.

MASTER and SERVANT:—

1. Agreement as to compensation—Right to sue for wages while receiving compensation—Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897.—Where a workman has by agreement received weekly compensation during incapacity for injuries, he cannot afterwards sue for wages during the period of incapacity, even though he still remains during that period in the employment of his master.—ELLIOTT v. ZIGGINS, K.B.D., 524; [1902] 2 K. B. 84; 71 L. J. K. B. 483.

2. Employers' liability—Accident—Compensation—Arbitration—Question as to liability to pay compensation or amount or duration thereof—Jurisdiction of arbitrator—Condition precedent to—Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, s. 1, sub-section 3.—In an arbitration under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, it is a condition precedent to the jurisdiction of a county court judge to act as arbitrator under section 1, sub-section 3, of the Act, that a question should have arisen between the parties as to the liability to pay compensation under the Act or as to the amount or duration of such compensation.

A workman having met with an accident arising out of and in the course of an employment within the scope of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, and being thereby incapacitated for work, was, from a fortnight after the accident, regularly paid by his employers weekly sums of the full amount that could be recovered under the Act—viz, fifty per cent. of his average weekly earnings, and this they promised to continue to do during his incapacity.

Held, on the workman taking arbitration proceedings under the Act, that the county court judge had no jurisdiction to hear the case, as no question within the meaning of section 1. sub-section 3, had arisen between the parties.—FIELD v. LONGDEN, C.A., 212; [1902] 1 K. B. 47; 71 L. J. K. B. 120; 85 L. T. 571.

3. Employer's liability—Accident—Compensation—Building—Exceeding thirty feet in height—Level to be calculated from—Foundation footings—Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, s. 7 (1).—In ascertaining the height of a building in course of erection for the purpose of deciding whether it is a building which exceeds thirty feet in height within the meaning of section 7, sub-section 1, of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, that part of the wall which is below the street level measured from the top of the concrete foundations may properly be included; even, semble, where that part of the wall is intended subsequently to be covered up with soil.—McGRATH v. NEILL, C.A., 162; [1902] 1 K. B. 211; 71 L. J. K. B. 58.

4. Employers' liability—Accident—Compensation—Contractor—Person employed by contractor in coal mine—Conditions of employment—Liability of mine owner—"Workman"—Employers and Workmen Act, 1875, s. 10—Employers' Liability Act, 1880 (43 & 44 Vict. c. 42), s. 8.—A contractor agreed with a colliery owner to sink a shaft in a pit at a certain sum per yard. The contractor employed and paid the workmen engaged in the sinking operations. The workmen, before entering on the work, signed certain conditions prescribed by the colliery owner for the regulation of persons employed, directly or indirectly, at the colliery. One of the workmen employed by the contractor, while employed in the work, was killed by an accident owing to the negligence of the colliery owner. In an action by the personal representative of the deceased against the colliery owner to recover damages under the Employers' Liability Act, 1880, Held, that the signing of the conditions by the deceased did not make him a workman in the employment of the colliery owner within the Employers' Liability Act, 1880, and that the action would not lie.

Judgment of the Divisional Court (49 W. R. 491, [1901] 1 K. B. 756) affirmed.—FITZPATRICK v EVANS, C.A., 290; [1902] 1 K. B. 505; 71 L. J. K. B. 302; 86 L. T. 141.

5. Employer's liability—Accident—Compensation—Building—"Scaffolding"—Roof of building being repaired by a ladder resting against parapet—Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, s. 7, sub-section 1.—A workman was employed to repair the roof of a building exceeding thirty feet in height. To do the work he used a ladder, one end of which was on the pavement and the other rested on the parapet at the top of the house. There was no second ladder, crawling-board, or other contrivance on the roof. The applicant was injured while carrying slates up the ladder for use on the roof.

Held, that the county court judge was entitled to find as a fact that the ladder was not "scaffolding" within the meaning of section 7 of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, and therefore that the Act did not apply.—MARSHALL v. RUDEFORTH, C.A., 596; [1902] 2 K. B. 175; 86 L. T. 752.

6. Employer's liabilty—Accident—Compensation—Death resulting from injury—Natural or probable consequence—Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, s. 1, sub-section 1; Schedule I., 1 (a).—Where a workman sustains personal injury by accident arising out of and in the course of his employment and he subsequently dies, it is sufficient for the dependants who claim compensation to show that death in fact resulted from the injury; it is immaterial that death was not the natural or probable consequence of the injury.—DUNHAM v. CLARE, C.A., 596; 71 L. J. K. B. 683; 86 L. T. 751.

7. Express liability—Accident—Compensation—"Dependants"—Dependency on son's earnings—Standard of living—Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, Schedule I., clause 1.—An applicant sought compensation for the loss of his son, and evidence was given that the applicant could maintain himself and his family without assistance from the earnings of the deceased.

Held, reversing the decision of the county court judge, that this fact did not debar the applicant from compensation as being partially "dependent" upon the earnings of the deceased at the time of his death.—HOWELLS v. VIVIAN, C.A., 163; 85 L. T. 529.

8. Employers' Liability—Accident—Compensation—Dependants—"Wholly dependent on his earnings"—Sum coming to applicant on death of workman—Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, Schedule I., clause 1 (a) (i.).—A workman's sole means for the support of himself and his wife and family were his weekly earnings. He was killed by an accident, and his widow applied for compensation as being "wholly dependent on his earnings," within Schedule I, clause 1 (a) (i.) to the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897. It appeared that the workman was possessed of a sum of money of which the applicant received on his death the sum of £100. There was no evidence that this sum ever produced any income during his lifetime.

Held, that the applicant was "wholly dependent on his earnings," as the £100 which came to her after his death ought not to be taken into consideration.—PRYCE v. PENRIKYBER NAVIGATION COLLIERY CO., C.A., 197; [1902] 1 K. B. 221; 71 L. J. K. B. 192.

9. Employers' liability—Accident—Compensation—Dependants in part dependent on earnings of deceased workman—Funeral expenses—Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, Schedule I. (1) (a) (ii.) (iii.)—Workmen's Compensation Rules, 1898, r. 4 (3).—In an arbitration under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, it appeared that the deceased workman was at the time of the accident living with his father and mother, and that he was in the habit of paying his weekly earnings of 8s to his mother to put into the common family fund. Shortly after the accident the father left his wife and family, and the mother gave notice of request for arbitration, claiming compensation as having been partly dependent on her son's earnings. No steps were taken for making the father a respondent to the arbitration proceedings in accordance with rule 4 (3) of the Workmen's Compensation Rules, 1898. The county court judge made an award in favour of the mother for a weekly payment of 3s. for the period of three years, and the sum of £6 8s. for funeral expenses.

Held, that, even if the father ought to have been made a respondent to the proceedings under rule 4 (3), which was doubtful having regard to rule 2, the employers, not having taken the point before the county court judge, were not entitled to take it on appeal.

Held, also, that the county court judge, in determining what sum was reasonable and proportionate to the injury to the dependants under Schedule I. (1) (a) (ii.), was entitled to take into consideration the funeral expenses and to award a named sum in respect of those expenses, subject to the limitation imposed by the maximum mentioned in the schedule.—BEVAN v. CRAWSHAY, C.A., 98; [1902] 1 K. B. 25; 71 L. J. K. B. 49; 85 L. T. 496.

10. Employers' liability—Accident—Compensation—Engineering work—Railroad—Tramway—Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, s. 7, sub section 2.—The word "railroad" in the definition of "engineering work" in sub-section 2 of section 7 of the Workmen's Compensation Act. 1897, is not limited in its meaning to a "railway" as defined in the same sub-section, but includes a tramway.—FLETCHER v. LONDON UNITED TRAMWAYS, C.A., 597; [1902] 2 K. B. 269; 71 L. J. K. B. 653; 86 L. T. 700.

11. Employers' liability—Accident—Compensation—Factory—Dock, wharf, or quay—Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, s. 7.—On a claim by a workman for compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, the county court judge found as a fact that a piece of ground used for storing timber near to a dock where the accident happened was a factory as being a dock, wharf, or quay within the meaning of section 7 (2).

On appeal to the Court of Appeal,

Held, that there was evidence to support the finding, and therefore the court were bound by it. —KENNY v. HARRISON, C.A.; [1902] 2 K. B. 168.

12. Employer's liability—Accident—Compensation—Factory—Mechanical power—Warehouse—Factory and Workshop Act, 1878, s. 93—Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, s. 7.—The use of machinery moved by hand power is not the use of "mechanical power" within the meaning of those words in the definition of "non-textile factory" contained in section 93 of the Factory and Workshop Act, 1878.

The word "warehouse" in section 7 of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, is not confined to premises contiguous to water.—WILMOTT v. PATON, C.A., 148; [1902] 1 K. B. 237; 71 L. J. K. B. 1; 85 L. T. 569.

13. Employers' liability—Accident—Compensation—"Factory"—Painting ship in dock—"Undertakers"—Factory and Workshop Act, 1895, s. 23—Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, s. 7.—The respondents contracted with shipowners to do the painting and plumbing work on one of their ships which was lying in a wet dock, and which was being fitted out for a voyage. The applicant, who was in the employment of the respondents, was sent with other men to do the work, and was engaged on the painting work when he was injured by an accident. The shipowners were in charge of the ship with part of the crew on board, but the respondents were in possession of the ship as far as was necessary for the work to be done. In proceedings to assess compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, the county court judge made an award in favour of the applicant.

Held, that there was evidence upon which the county court judge could find that the applicant was injured while employed in a factory, in respect of which the respondents were the undertakers, and that therefore he was entitled to compensation.—BARTELL v. GRAY, C.A., 310; [1902] 1 K. B. 225; 71 L. J. K. B. 115; 85 L. T. 658.

14. Employers' liability—Accident—Compensation "Factory"—Ship in wet dock—Costs—Action under Employers' Liability Act, 1880—Action dismissed—Compensation assessed under Workman's Compensation Act, 1897—County Courts Act, 1888, ss. 113, 186—Factory and Workshop Act, 1895, s. 23—Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, s. 1, sub-section 4; s. 7; Schedule II., clauses 6, 10.—A workman was killed while employed on a ship lying in a wet dock. An action by his widow under the Employers' Liability Act, 1880, was dismissed, and the county court judge, upon the plaintiff's application, assessed compensation, under section 1, sub-section 4, of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, holding that the deceased man's employment at the time of the accident was on, in, or about a "factory" within section 7 of the Act, and he gave the plaintiff the costs of and incident to the proceedings.

Held, (1) that the employment being on a ship in a dock was employment in a "factory" within the meaning of the Act; and (2) that the county court judge had power to give the plaintiff the costs of the proceedings.—CATTERMOLE v. ATLANTIC TRANSPORT CO., C.A., 129; [1902] 1 K. B. 204; 71 L. J. K. B. 173; 85 L. T. 513.

15. Employers' liability—Accident—Compensation—Machinery, defect in condition of—Machine no longer in use—"Machinery or plant connected with or used in the business of the employer"—Injury to workman—Employers' Liability Act, 1880, s. 1, sub-section 1.—A machine used in the defendants' business broke down, and the foreman directed that it should be removed from the position in which it had been placed while in use. The plaintiff, who was a workman in the employment of the defendants, assisted in removing the machine, and was injured while doing so by reason of a defect in the machine which was within the knowledge of the foreman. In an action under the Employers' Liability Act, 1880,

Held, that the fact that the machine at the time of the accident had broken down, and was no longer in use, did not necessarily show that it had ceased to be "machinery or plant connected with or used in the business of the employer" within the meaning of section 1, sub-section 1, of the Act.

Judgment of the King's Bench Division ([1901] 2 K. B 483) reversed.—THOMPSON v. CITY GLASS BOTTLE CO., C.A.; [1902] 1 K. B. 233; 71 L. J. K. B. 145; 85 L. T. 661.

16. Employers' liability—Accident—Compensation—Payment into court—Stay of proceedings—Costs up to payment into court—Jurisdiction of arbitrator—Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, Schedule II., par. 6—Workmen's Compensation Rules, 1898, r. 5 (3). —The employers of a workman who met with his death by accident in the course of his employment agreed with his widow as to the amount of compensation to which she was entitled under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, but refused to pay her the amount because she had not taken out letters of administration. She commenced proceedings under the Act, and thereupon the employers paid the amount into court.

Held, that, though by rule 5 (3) of the Workmen's Compensation Rules, 1898, the payment into court operated as a stay of proceedings, the county court judge had jurisdiction to make an order allowing the widow her costs up to the payment into court and also her costs of the application for costs.—CLATWORTHY v. R. & H. GREEN (LIMITED), C.A., 610; 86 L. T. 702.

17. Employer's liability—Accident—Compensation Scaffolding—Ladder and crawling-board—Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, s. 7.—In an arbitration under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, it appeared that the applicant and a fellow-workman, in the course of their duty, carried a crawling-board up a ladder and placed it on the roof of a building for the purpose of doing some repairs. While the applicant was adjusting the upper end of the board to the ridge of the roof, and the other man, standing on the ladder, was holding the lower end of the board, the board slipped, and the applicant fell and was injured.

Held (Stirling, L.J., dissenting), that the applicant was employed in repairing a building by means of a scaffolding within the meaning of the Act.—VEAZEY v. CHATTLE, C.A., 263; [1902] 1 K. B. 494; 71 L. J. K. B. 252; 85 L. T. 574.

18. Employers' liability—Accident—Compensation—Serious and wilful misconduct—Contributory negligence—Where a sudden impulse rather than wilful disobedience caused the accident—Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, s. 1, sub-section 2 (c). —The applicant was a lad who worked at a machine used to cut slits in the heads of screws.

He had been frequently warned not to put his hand near the wheel while it was in motion. There was no guard on the wheel. A screw having fallen out on to the table before it was cut, he leaned over the machine to pick it up and replace it, and two of his fingers were cut off.

The county court judge found that though the lad was negligent, he was not "guilty of serious and wilful misconduct."

Held, that the element of wilfulness did not enter at all into what the lad did, as he seemed to have acted on a sudden impulse, and therefore the award could be supported.—REEKS v. KYNOCH, C.A., 113.

19. Employers' liability—Accident—Compensation—Sub-contracting—Work ancillary to business of undertakers—Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, s. 7.—When a workman's employers, who were engineers, contracted with a firm of cotton spinners to supply and fix a driving wheel in their cotton factory, and one of the engineers' workmen was accidentally killed while engaged in the operation of lifting the wheel into its place.

Held, that what took place in the cotton factory was not "on or in or about the factory" of the undertakers (the engineers), within the meaning of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, s. 7.—WRIGLEY v. WHITTAKER, H.L., 656; [1902] A. C. 299; 71 L. J. K. B. 600; 86 L. T. 775.

20. Employers' liability—Accident—Compensation—Sub-contractor, liability of.—The appellants undertook to build a house and agreed with a sub-contractor that he should slate the roof. A workman employed by the sub-contractor was killed in the course of his employment and his widow was awarded compensation against the appellants as undertakers under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897.

Held, that the sub-contractor would have been liable as an undertaker independently of section 4 of the Act, and that the appellants were entitled to be indemnified by him against the amount of compensation awarded. — COOPER & CRANE v. WRIGHT, H.L.; [1902] A. C. 302; 71 L. J. K. B. 642; 86 L. T. 776.

21. Employer's liability—Accident—Compensation—Sub-contractor—Work ancillary to the business of the undertakers—Erection of iron roof—Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, s. 4.—In an arbitration under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, it appeared that the respondent had contracted to build a boiler-house, and that the deceased workman was in the employment of a firm who had sub-contracted with the respondent to erect an iron roof to the boiler-house. The county court judge found, as a fact, that the erection of an iron roof was not part of the respondent's business, but, on a consideration of the character of the business as it was generally carried on, he found that such work was not merely ancillary to the respondent's business.

Held, that the finding of the county court judge was conclusive to show that the work was merely ancillary to the respondent's business, and therefore the respondent was not liable under section 4 of the Act, the case coming within the exemption contained in the last paragraph of the section.

Knight v. Cubitt & Co., ante, p. 113, [1902] 1 K. B. 31, distinguished.—BUSH v. HAWES, C.A., 311; [1902] 1 K. B. 216; 71 L. J. K. B. 68; 85 L. T. 507.

22. Employers' liability—Accident—Compensation—Sub-contractor—Work ancillary to the business of the undertakers—Height of building—Work of demolition—Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, ss. 4, 7.—The appellants, who were builders, entered into a contract to demolish and rebuild a house which exceeded thirty feet in height. They then made a sub-contract with one Clements to do the work of demolition. A workman in the employment of Clements was killed by an accident while engaged in the work of demolition, the building at that time being only eleven feet in height, with the exception of the party-wall, which remained standing and exceeded thirty feet in height. It appeared that the appellants habitually entered into contracts to demolish and rebuild houses, but they never did the work of demolition themselves, always sub-contracting with another person to do that part of the work. In proceedings by the widow of the deceased man to recover compensation from the appellants under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, the county court judge found that the house at the time of the accident exceeded thirty feet in height, and that the work of demolition was not merely ancillary to but was part of the business of the appellants, and he held that they were liable as "undertakers" to pay compensation under section 4 of the Act.

Held, that there was evidence upon which the county court judge was justified in finding that the house at the time of the accident exceeded thirty feet in height, as the party-wall which exceeded that height was standing; and, further, that the work of demolition was part of and not merely ancillary to the business of the appellants, and that they were therefore liable as undertakers under section 4.—KNIGHT v. CUBITT, C.A., 113; [1902] 1 K. B. 31; 71 L. J. K. B. 65; 85 L. T. 526.

23. Employers' liability—Accident—Compensation—Third party, injury caused by—Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, s. 6.—A workman having been injured in the course of his employment by the negligence of a third person obtained an award under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, against his employer. He then brought an action against the third person claiming damages for pain and suffering and the expenses he had been put to and the balance of his wages.

Held, that the action would not lie by virtue of section 6 of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897.—TONG v. GREAT NORTHERN RAILWAY CO., K.B.D.; 86 L. T. 802.

24. Employers' liability—Accident—Compensation Tortious act of fellow-workmen—Act having no relation to the employment—Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, s. 1.—Where an accident happened to a workman while engaged at his work through the tortious act of a fellow-workman which had no relation whatever to their employment.

Held, that the accident did not arise out of the employment within the meaning of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, s. 1 (1).—ARMITAGE v. LANCASHIRE AND YORKSHIRE RAILWAY, C.A.; [1902] 2 K. B. 178; 86 L. T. 883.

25. Employers' liability—Accident—Compensation—Weekly earnings—"Average weekly earnings"—Stevedore employed for one day—Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, Schedule I., cl. 1 (b).—A casual stevedore's labourer was employed for one day to assist in discharging cargo from a vessel in a dock. During the day he met with an accident. He had then earned 3s. 3d.

Held, that as there was no presumption that the stevedore would have been employed by the same employer beyond the day, the amount of compensation he was entitled to was a weekly payment of one-half of 3s. 3d., the sum he had actually earned in that employment.—BARTLETT v. SUTTON, C.A., 149; [1902] 1 K. B. 72; 71 L. J. K. B. 52; 85 L. T. 531.

26. Employers' liability—Accident—Compensation—Weekly earnings—Employed less than two weeks—Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, Schedule I.—A workman was employed to work in the demolition of a building, the terms of his employment being that he should work sixty hours a week—viz., eleven hours a day on five days of the week and five hours on Saturday, at the wages of 7½d. an hour, and that he should be liable to be discharged at an hour's notice. When he had worked for four days, for a period altogether of forty-four hours, he was accidentally injured.

Held, that, as there was a presumption that his employment would continue from week to week, there was evidence to support the finding that his average weekly earnings within the meaning of the Workmen's Compensation Act were sixty times 7½d.

A workman was employed to work as a haulier at the wages of 5s. 2d. a day. He began to work on a Wednesday and he continued to work every day, Sunday included, till the following Wednesday, when he was accidentally injured. He received as wages for eight days £2 1s. 4d.

Held, that, as he had worked for a period of more than a week at 5s. 2d. a day, although that period was partly in one calendar week and partly in another, there was evidence to support the finding that his average weekly earnings were six times 5s. 2d.—AYRES v. BUCKERIDGE; WHEALE AND JONES v. RHYMNEY IRON CO., C.A., 115; [1902] 1 K. B. 57; 71 L. J. K. B. 28; 85 L. T. 472.

27. Employers' liability—Accident—Compensation—Weekly payment—Time from which it may be ended, diminished, or increased—Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, s. 1 (b), 12; Schedule I.—When an application to review a weekly payment on the ground that the workman's incapacity has ceased is brought before an arbitrator, he is not bound to treat the weekly payment as enforceable up to the time of his decision, but has jurisdiction to inquire whether the incapacity had ceased when the application to review was made, or at any and what subsequent time before the hearing, and to make his award with reference to the date so determined.—MORTON & CO. v. WOODWARD, C.A.; [1902] 2 K. 28. Employers' liability—Accident—Compensation—"Wharf"—Factory and Workshop Act, 1895, s. 23—Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, s. 7.—A workman was injured by an accident while employed in the hold of a ship, which was lying alongside a floating structure in the Thames, assisting in the unloading of a ship. The structure was moored in the river by chains fastened to piles driven into the bed of the river, and was used as a place where cargoes were loaded and discharged. There was no connection or communication with the shore except by means of boats.

Held, that the structure was a wharf within the meaning of section 23 of the Factory and Workshop Act, 1895, and was therefore a "factory" within section 7 of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897.—ELLIS v. CORY, C.A., 131; [1902] 1 K. B. 38; 71 L. J. K. B. 72; 85 L. T. 499.

29. Employers' liability—"Accident"—Compensation—Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, s. 1, sub-section 1.—A workman in the course of his employment was removing an empty yarn beam from a loom when a sudden strain, caused by his shifting it in order to get it more evenly balanced on his shoulder, had the effect of tearing some of the fibres of the muscles of his back.

Held, that the injury was caused by an "accident" within the meaning of section 1, sub-section 1, of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897.—BOARDMAN v. SCOTT, C.A., 184; [1902] 1 K. B. 43; 71 L. J. K. B. 3; 85 L. T. 502.

31. Negligence—Hire of van and driver—Liability of general master—Control of driver—Construction of hiring agreement.—A carman entered into a written contract with an ironfounder for supplying vans, horses, and drivers to the ironfounder for use in the ironfounder's business. Under the terms of this contract the carman was to send to the ironfounder each working morning a van and horse with a capable man to drive and take charge of it, the man in the carman's employ, and all charges and claims whatsoever in reference to the van, horse, and man being paid by the carman, and he to be responsible for the same; the ironfounder to be only responsible for the due payment for the van, horse, and man at a certain rate per annum. A driver sent by the carman to the ironfounder with a van and horse under this contract was directed by the ironfounder to load some iron girders on the van and deliver them at a certain yard. By the negligence of the driver in unloading the girders, one of them fell and injured the plaintiff. No one on behalf of the ironfounder interfered in any way with the driver in unloading the girders.

Held, that, on the true construction of the contract of hiring, the driver was to remain under the control of the carman, so that the carman, and not the ironfounder, was responsible for the driver's negligence.—WALDOCK v. WINFIELD, C.A.; [1901] 2 K. B. 596; 70 L. J. K. B. 925; 85 L. T. 202.

32. Negligence of servant—Liability of master—Jobmaster—Hire of carriage and driver for use of jeweller's traveller — Obligation to take care of carriage during temporary absence of traveller—Obligation to take care of contents of carriage—Liability of jobmaster for loss of jewellery by theft.—The plaintiff, a wholesale jeweller, entered into a contract with the defendant, a jobmaster, for the hire of a brougham and driver for the use of the plaintiff's traveller, and the brougham was fitted up for the purpose of such use. The traveller having gone into an hotel to get his lunch, leaving the brougham in the street, the driver also went away for a similar purpose, and in their absence a quantity of the plaintiff's jewellery was stolen from the brougham. In an action to recover the value of the jewellery,

Held, that the defendant was liable, because there was an obligation on him to provide a driver who would take care of the contents of the brougham during intervals when the traveller would necessarily be absent.

35. Wages—Deductions—Waiver by not claiming at end of each week.—By an agreement made between the respondents and the appellant the wages were to be at the rate of 24s. per week, and so in proportion for any less period than a week. The wages were to be at the rate of 24s. per week at the least. During the employment, owing to various causes the appellant was not employed for certain periods, and no wages were paid to him in respect of those periods, but the wages were settled up at the end of each week when the deductions were made.

Held, that the appellant could not recover the amount of these deductions at the end of the employment, as it was a claim that could be waived, being a claim for damages and not a liquidated debt.—STODDART v. MITCHELL, K.B.D.; 85 L. T. 686.

METROPOLIS:—

1. Buildings—Stand for viewing state procession—Powers of supervision and inspection—Transfer of power from London County Council to borough council.—The powers, duties, and liabilities of district surveyors with respect to the supervision or inspection of wooden structures falling within section 84 of the London Building Act, 1894, have not been transferred to the Westminster City Council by section 5, sub-section 1, of the London Government Act, 1899, and Schedule II., Part I., of the Act, but the district surveyors have neither the right, power, nor obligation of performing any duties prescribed by a licence granted by the Westminster city unless by its terms it indicates that they are the persons to fulfil the duties.

Where matters are involved which impose upon a district surveyor the right of inspecting such a wooden structure under the terms of the Act, the district surveyor should have notice given to him under section 145 of the London Building Act, 1894. For example, questions might arise of dangerous structures or as to interference with some street or street-line.—WESTMINSTER CITY COUNCIL v. WATSON, K.B.D.; 71 L. J. K. B. 603.

2. Combined scheme—Order of local authority—Alteration—No order—Drain a sewer.—Certain houses in B. street in 1853 were drained by a combined scheme under the order of the local authority.

In 1889 No. 85, B.-street was disconnected from No. 83, and connected to its adjoining house on the other side, No. 87. No order was made by the authority for this, but it was superintended by their officers.

In 1900 the owner of No. 85 erected a workshop on the garden, and the drainage from that, including an additional w.c., was connected with the drain of No. 87. This was superintended by the respondents' officers, and, although a plan had been approved by the respondents, the work was not in fact carried out in accordance with that plan.

Held, that the drain of No. 87 did not become a sewer.—GORRINGE v. SHOREDITCH CORPORATION, K.B.D.; 86 L. T. 592.

3. Hackney carriage—Negligence of driver—Liability of proprietor—Licence taken out in name of one partner—London Hackney Carriages Acts, 1831 (1 & 2 Will. 4, c. 22) and 1843 (6 & 7 Vict. c. 86).—The proprietor of a hackney carriage is liable, as a master, under the London Hackney Carriages Act, 1843, so far as regards the members of the public, for the acts of the driver, though the licence for the carriage is not taken out in his name.—GATES v. BILL, C.A., 546; [1902] 2 K. B. 38.

4. Highway—Agreement as to signpost on highway—Not under seal—Statute of Frauds—Obstruction to highway.—The proprietor of a public-house with a "draw-up" in front of it which also belonged to him offered by letter to the corporation of the borough to permit such draw-up to be thrown into the public road on condition that his signpost was allowed to continue at a convenient spot on the widened highway, and that certain front gardens belonging to other frontagers were also thrown into the road. The corporation did not reply to this letter, but subsequently it did throw the said gardens and the draw-up into the public road. The proprietor of the public-house thereupon erected his signpost in the highway some forty-five feet from the site of the draw-up. The corporation threatened to have it removed.

Held, that the proprietor was entitled to restrain such removal, as the facts constituted an agreement between him and the corporation in the terms of his letter, and that such agreement was part performed by the action of the corporation and was not an illegal agreement as sanctioning the erection of an obstruction in the highway, but was within the powers conferred on the corporation by section 144 of the Metropolis Management Act, 1855.—HOARE & CO. v. MAYOR, &C., OF LEWISHAM, K.B.D.; 85 L. T. 281.

5. Management Acts—Street—"New street"—Sewering—Expenses—New buildings on one side of old street—Sewer put in on new side—Liability of frontagers—Highway forming boundary of metropolis—Metropolis Management Amendment Act, 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 102), ss. 52, 53.—An old highway which formed the boundary between the parish of Hornsey, in the county of Middlesex, and the parish of Clerkenwell, in the County of London, had buildings erected on the Hornsey side of it for almost its whole length before 1856, when the Metropolis Management Act, 1855, came into operation. On the Clerkenwell side there were then only a few houses. Recently the Clerkenwell side also had been covered with buildings, and in 1898 the Clerkenwell Vestry laid down a sewer under their part of the highway to receive the drainage of the houses on their side. It was found as a fact that the road, taken as a whole, was sufficiently built upon to be a street before the Metropolis Management Act, 1855, came into operation.

Held, that, for the purpose of determining whether the frontagers on the Clerkenwell side of the road were liable under sections 52 and 53 of the Metropolis Management Act, 1862, to contribute to the expense of making the sewer as for the drainage of a "new street," the road must be treated as a whole, and the Clerkenwell side could not be treated as being by itself a new street.

6. Paving apportionment—Dismissal of summons on ground of street not being a new street — Fresh apportionment—Res judicata—Metropolis Management Acts, 1855-1890.—On the 9th of November, 1898, the H. Vestry resolved that R.-street be paved as a new street, and apportioned the sum of £37 16*s.* 8*d.* on the respondent, which he refused to pay.

On the 15th of September, 1899, the H. Vestry summoned the respondent for that sum, but the summons was dismissed on the ground that R.-street was not a new street within the Metropolis Management Acts.

On the 13th of June, 1900, a resolution was passed by the H. Vestry rescinding the above apportionment, and on the 14th of March, 1901, the H. Borough Council resolved that R.-street be paved as a new street, and apportioned on the respondent the sum of £32 16*s.* 1*d.*, which he refused to pay, and thereupon the present summons was issued.

The magistrate held that the adjudication of the 15th of September, 1899, was conclusive, and he dismissed the summons.

Held, on the authority of Reg. v. Hutchins, 44 L. T. Rep. 364, and Wakefield Corporation v. Cooke, 86 L. T. Rep. 198, that the decision of the 15th of September, 1899, was not conclusive, and the present case should be heard on its merits.—SCOTT v. LOWE, K.B.D.; 86 L T. 421.

7. Public health—Public convenience—Approaches—Subway—Trespass—Subsoil of roadway and footway—Injunction—Public Health (Metropolis) Act, 1891 (54 & 55 Vict. c. 76), s. 44.—Section 44 of the Public Health (Metropolis) Act, 1891, vests the subsoil of the roadway in the sanitary authority for the purpose of making public conveniences; in making these it is within their power to make subways from either side on the street as a means of approach. The fact that the public may use these subways as a means of passing from one side of the street to the other without availing themselves of the conveniences does not make the construction of these subways ultra vires.

It is, however, a trespass upon the lands of the adjoining owner to take any portion of the footway as a site for such convenience or the approaches thereto, for though section 44 of the Act vests the subsoil of the roadway in the sanitary authority for that purpose, the subsoil of the footways is expressly excepted, and the rule that the land usque ad medium filum viæ belongs to the adjoining owner still applies up to the line of the kerb.

The fact that the footway has been recently widened makes no difference to this rule.—LONDON AND NORTH-WESTERN RAILWAY CO v. WESTMINSTER (MAYOR), Ch.D. Joyce, J, 268; [1902] 1 Ch. 269; 71 L.J. Ch. 34; 85 L. T. 544.

8. Rating—Deficiency in rates—Distress warrant—Company to pay all consolidated and other rates on lands and buildings during construction of railway—Buildings partially pulled down when company acquired land—Jurisdiction to rate—Appeal—Great Northern and City Railway Act, 1892. s. 69.—The respondents, on the 1st of January, 1900, acquired under their private Act land upon which buildings formerly known as 30, Finsbury-pavement had previously existed but did not take actual physical occupation until October, 1900. The buildings had been pulled down about May, 1899, at which time the respondents had no interest therein.

In the valuation list in force in January, 1900, being the quinquennial list made in 1895, these premises were assessed at £292 rateable value. In 1899 a supplemental valuation list was made for the parish by which this property was proposed to be taken out of rating, as it was then vacant land. The list was duly confirmed on the 24th of November, 1899, but did not come into operation until the 6th of April, 1900. On the 4th of April, 1900, a provisional list continuing the property in the valuation list was made and duly confirmed. A poor rate was duly made on the 8th of May, 1900, and another on the 5th of November, 1900, and the respondents were rated upon the rateable value at which the premises were assessed in the provisional list—viz., £292.

Upon the respondents being summoned to show cause why they had not paid, and refused to pay, the rates, the respondents objected that at the time the rates were made the land was vacant land not built upon. The justices dismissed the summons.

Held, that the justices were right, the question of non-liability having been properly raised before them, the point raised involving a question of jurisdiction to rate, and not merely a matter of appeal.—ST. STEPHEN'S (CHURCHWARDENS) v. GREAT NORTHERN AND CITY RAILWAY CO., K.B.D., 395; 86 L. T. 390.

9. Rating—Poor rate—Valuation list—Omission to give notice of increase of valuation—Refusal to pay increased rate—Application for distress warrant—Objection to issue of warrant—Appeal against valuation list—Valuation (Metropolis) Act, 1869 (32 & 33 Vict. c. 67), ss. 9, 45.—Where the overseers of a parish raise the gross or rateable value of a hereditament, and no notice of such alteration, as required by section 9 of the Valuation (Metropolis) Act, 1869, has been served upon the occupier of the hereditament, the occupier cannot, on the application for a distress warrant to recover the balance of the rate, raise the objection that no such notice had been served upon him, that objection being one that could only be raised by an appeal against the valuation list or against the rate.—WESTMINSTER CORPORATION v. ARMY AND NAVY AUXILIARY

MINES:—

1. Clay—Mines and other minerals—Railway company—Purchase of surface—"Mineral"—Railways Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845 (8 & 9 Vict. c. 20), ss. 77, 78.—The principles governing cases like Hext v. Gill, (1872) L. R. 7 Ch. 699, which deal with a reservation of minerals by virtue of a grant or contract, are not applicable to the determination of cases arising out of a statutory reservation of minerals, like that contained in section 77 of the Railways Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845.

Though a mineral primâ facie includes anything lying under the land which has a value of its own as being capable of being used independently of the land, yet that rule may be modified by the circumstances of the case where the mineral in question is excepted only by virtue of a statutory reservation. Clay forming the surface or subsoil and constituting "the land" purchased for the purposes of the undertaking is not a "mineral" within section 77 of the Railways Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, as interpreted by Lord Provost and Magistrates of Glasgow v. Farie, (1888) 13 App. Cas. 657.

Semble, the same clay may be a mineral in one district and not in another.—GREAT WESTERN RAILWAY CO. v. BLADES, Ch.D. Buckley, J.; [1901] 2 Ch. 624; 70 L. J. Ch. 847; 85 L. T. 308.

When the case came up for argument a preliminary objection was taken by the respondent that the inspector was not a "person aggrieved" within the meaning of section 33.

Held, that a case must be taken to have been stated under section 2 of the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1857, and under section 33 of the Act of 1879, read together, the earlier of which Acts provides that "either party" may apply to have a case stated.

Held, also, that the justices were right in refusing to convict the agent of the mine for failing to cause adequate ventilation to be provided in the mine.—STOKES v. MITCHESON, K.B.D., 553; [1902] 1 K. B. 857; 71 L. J. K. B. 677; 86 L. T. 767.

3. Payment of miners according to amount excavated—New South Wales Coal Mines Regulation Act, 1896 (60 Vict. No. 12), s. 38, sub-section 1—Construction.—The respondent having been convicted of contravening section 38, sub-section 1, of the New South Wales Coal Mines Regulation Act of 1896 by not paying his miners according to the actual weight gotten by them of the mineral contracted to be gotten,

Held, that on the true construction of the section, as it appeared that by the contract of employment the miners were to be paid according to the yardage of excavation, which had no necessary or constant relation to the amount of mineral gotten, the Act was inapplicable and the conviction was erroneous.—HUMBLE v. HUMPHREYS, P.C.; [1902] A. MORTGAGE:—

1. Agreement to execute a legal mortgage—Provisions of legal mortgage—Construction of agreement—Consolidation—Conveyancing and Law of Property Act, 1881 (44 & 45 Vict. c. 41), s. 17.—An agreement in a memorandum of equitable mortgage that the mortgagor will execute a legal mortgage of the property "with such powers and provisions and in such form as" the mortgagee "may require for further securing the said principal moneys and interest," does not enable the mortgagee to insist upon the insertion in the legal mortgage of a clause excluding section 17 of the Conveyancing and Law of Property Act, 1881; and consequently the mortgagee cannot consolidate the equitable mortgage with another mortgage from the same mortgagor, upon the latter seeking to redeem that other mortgage alone.—FARMER v. PITT, Ch.D. Byrne, J., 453; [1902] 1 Ch. 954; 71 L. J. Ch. 560.

2. Costs—Price of redemption—Costs of preparing mortgage deed—Costs of application.—The costs of preparing a mortgage deed, investigating title, and paying stamp duty and survey fees, which are not paid at the time of the completion of the mortgage, are not mortgagee's costs which can be added to the price of redemption. They form a simple contract debt between the mortgagor and the mortgage.—WALES v. CARR, Ch.D. Farwell, J., 313; [1902] 1 Ch. 860; 71 L. J. Ch. 483; 86 L. T. 288.

3. Priority — Portion — Mortgage pursuant to order of court to raise two out of three portions charged on real estate. — Under the will of a testator who died in 1851 three sums of £5,000 for children's portions were charged on his real estate. In 1880 two of the portions had become raisable, and in an action brought for the purpose of clearing the estate from charges an order was made in 1882 directing that the two portions should be raised by a mortgage of the estate to a person who was willing to lend the money, such mortgage to be settled by the judge. The mortgage as settled contained recitals of the title to the portions and of the proceedings in the action, and was expressed to be without prejudice to any charge which might be subsisting in the mortgaged hereditaments under the will. The money was paid by the mortgagee into court, and was afterwards distributed among the persons interested. In an action by the mortgagee claiming priority over the persons interested in the remaining portion,

Held, that the court, in fulfilling the testator's directions, which was its only duty, could not have intended to place two of the portions in a better position than the third, or to give the mortgagee a charge for the two in priority to the third, which was from the first equally entitled to a like charge under the will:

Held, therefore, that, notwithstanding that the third portion was at present only charged in equity by virtue of the will, whereas the plaintiff had a legal mortgage sanctioned by the court, the plaintiff was only entitled to a charge on the estate for the two sums of £5,000 pari passu with the third sum of like amount.—NIGHTINGALE v. REYNOLDS, Ch.D. Kekewich, J.; [1902] 2 Ch. 117; 71 L. J. Ch. 586; 86 L. T. 703.

4. Redemption—Option to lender to enter into partnership with the mortgagor upon terms affecting the mortgaged property—Option to be exercised within time limited for redemption—Independent agreement.—Prior to July, 1898, the plaintiffs advanced to the defendant £5,000 upon the security of a ship and other property, upon the terms of an agreement made between them on the 23rd of April, 1896, whereby the money was not to be called in or paid for two years, and the plaintiffs might at any time within the two years elect to enter into partnership with the defendant upon the terms of their releasing the mortgage debt, and the ship and other property becoming partnership assets.

On the 27th of June, 1898, the defendant mortgaged to the plaintiffs certain wharves at Norwich to secure £2,000, part of the £5,000 then owing. The mortgage deed gave time for payment of this sum of £2,000 until the 27th of December, 1898.

On the 9th of July, 1898, another agreement was entered into between the plaintiffs and the defendant. It recited the agreement of 1896; that the plaintiffs had not entered into partnership; that the plaintiffs had applied for and the defendant was unable to pay the £5,000, and had requested the plaintiffs to extend the term of two years for a further period of five years; and it was thereby agreed (1) that the plaintiffs might, within five years, elect to enter into partnership with the defendant; (2) that the plaintiffs should in that event release the defendant from the payment of the £5,000, and transfer the mortgaged property for the purposes of the partnership; (3) that the capital of the partnership property should belong to defendant and plaintiffs in equal shares.

In February, 1900, the plaintiffs exercised their option and communicated to the defendant their intention to enter into partnership with him. The defendant refused to comply, alleging that the effect of the agreement was to render the property irredeemable, and that it was an illegal clog on the equity of redemption.

Held, that the agreement of the 9th of July, 1898, was subsequent to and independent of the original mortgage bargain; and that there being nothing unconscionable or unfair in the agreement in itself, the fact that the parties to it stood at the time in the relation to each other of mortgagor and mortgagee, did not prevent the agreement being enforceable.

Decision of Buckley, J. (49 W. R. 188), affirmed on different grounds.—LISLE v. REEVE, C.A., 231; [1902] 1 Ch. 53; 71 L. J. Ch. 42; 85 L. T. 464.

5. Redemption—Public-house—"Tied house"—Clogging redemption—"Once a mortgage always a mortgage"—Covenant to continue after redemption.—A covenant in a mortgage of a leasehold public-house that the mortgagor shall during the continuance of the term, whether or not any principal money or interest is still owing on the security, buy his beer only from the mortgagees, is a clog on the equity of redemption, as it prevents the mortgagor getting back the property unimpaired after payment of principal moneys and interest due on the security.

He is therefore entitled on redemption to an assignment of the premises free from the covenant.

Decision of the Court of Appeal (48 W. R. 629, [1900] 2 Ch. 445) affirmed.

6. Redemption action—Option to purchase—Stipulation that mortgagee may purchase mortgaged security at fixed price within definite time—Clog on equity of redemption.—A stipulation in a mortgage that the mortgagee shall have the option to purchase the whole or any part of the mortgaged security at a fixed price within a definite time is invalid as a clog on the equity of redemption.—JARRAH TIMBER AND WOOD PAVING CORPORATION v. SAMUEL, Ch.D. Kekewich, J., 601.

7. Shares—Fluctuating security—No day fixed for payment—Sale by mortgagee.—The defendants, who were stockbrokers, bought certain shares on behalf of the plaintiff. In pursuance of an arrangement between the plaintiff and the defendants the shares were entered on the register in the name of the defendants, and held by them as security for the purchase-money. The defendants made repeated applications to the plaintiff for payment of the purchase-money, but never received more than a portion of it. The company announcing a scheme of reconstruction, the defendants wrote to the plaintiff for instructions and for payment of his debt. Receiving no reply they applied for shares in the new company in their own names. They subsequently sold these shares in the belief that they were rightful owners. The plaintiff now alleged that the sale was improper and claimed redemption of the shares, or in the alternative damages for improper conversion.

Held (by Stirling and Cozens-Hardy, L.JJ., Vaughan Williams, L.J., dissentiente), that the defendants, as mortgagees of the shares with no fixed time for payment, were entitled to sell them on giving reasonable notice to the mortgagor; that their letters to the plaintiff demanding payment constituted such notice; and that they were not precluded from exercising their power of sale by the fact that they sold in the belief that they were absolute owners; consequently the sale was good, and the defendants were only liable to account for the proceeds as mortgagees.

Decision of Farwell, J. (49 W. R. 167, [1901] 1 Ch. 70), affirmed.—DEVERGES v. SANDEMAN, CLARK, & Co., C.A., 404; [1902] 1 Ch. 579; 71 L. J. Ch. 328; 86 L. T. 269.

NATAL, LAW of:—

1. Fraud — Prescription — Roman-Dutch law.—Where the same fraud which has induced a contract has also operated to deprive a plaintiff of his other remedies, the actio doli is still open to him, and under the Roman-Dutch law for the general period of prescription, which is thirty years.—DOUGLAS v. SANDER, P.C., 676; [1902] A. C. 437; 86 L. T. 633.

2. Practice—Appeal—Special leave—Conviction by special court—Acting judge—Colonial Laws Validity Act—Construction.—The obvious meaning of the Colonial Laws Validity Act (28 & 29 Vict. c. 63) is to preserve to the Imperial Parliament a right to legislate for a colony to which a local legislature has been assigned, and to forbid the local legislature to enact anything repugnant to Imperial legislation so effected, but not otherwise to derogate from the general powers of Colonial legislatures.

An acting judge of the Supreme Court is a judge thereof within the meaning of Natal Special Court Act, No. 14 of 1900.

Special leave to appeal from a conviction by a Special Court of Natal (constituted under the said Act) refused.—THE QUEEN v. MARAIS, MARAIS, EX PARTE, P.C.; [1902] A. C. 51; 71 L. J. P. C. 32; 85 L. T. 363.

NEGLIGENCE :—

1 Breach of duty—Contractual relation—Reckless misrepresentation apart from fraud — Cause of action.—The defendant, a professional water-finder, undertook for reward to indicate a spot upon the plaintiff's land where a supply of water might be found. He marked out a spot where he stated definitely water would be found at a particular depth from the surface. The plaintiff on the faith of this statement bored to a depth exceeding that named by the defendant, but found no water. The plaintiff brought an action in the county court to recover the expense of boring. The county court judge found that the defendant made the statement recklessly but did not find that he made it fraudulently.

Held, that the contractual relation between the parties imposed on the defendant the duty to refrain from making reckless statements; that the defendant had committed a breach of this duty, and was therefore liable in an action for damages.—PRITTY v. CHILD, K.B.D.; 71 L. J. K. B. 512.

2. Breach of duty—False evidence — Wrongful conviction—Conviction unreversed—Cause of action. — An action to recover damages for a breach of duty whereby the plaintiff was wrongfully convicted of an offence, or for negligently giving untrue evidence whereby the plaintiff was so convicted, cannot be maintained while the conviction stands. — BYNOE v. BANK OF ENGLAND, C.A., 359; [1902] 1 K. B. 467; 71 L. J. K. B. 208; 86 L. T. 140.

3. Negligence—Damage by electricity—Statutory powers.—The respondent companies were authorized by statute to work tramways by electric power, and provision was made that in the event of any electric leak taking place and damage being caused by electrolysis or otherwise, that the companies should make good the damage, &c., and also that the tram rails were not to be used for the return of the electric current without consent, which was obtained upon conditions as to reversing the direction of the current, &c., and removing the danger. A short part of the tramway was not authorized by statute. Certain disturbances in the working of the appellants' submarine telegraph took place, caused by electricity which had been stored by respondents and used in propelling their cars on the above lines. This was brought about by a part of the electricity which escaped from the tram rails and reached the appellants' cable. It was afterwards discovered that the disturbances might be effectively provided against. The result was pecuniary loss to the appellants.

Held, (1) that the respondents were not liable at common law within the principle of Fletcher v. Rylands, L. R. 3 H. L 330, 17 W. R. Dig. 17, there being no tangible injury caused by any unlawful use of their tramway by the respondents; (2) nor under the statutes.—EASTERN AND SOUTH AFRICAN TELEGRAPH CO. v. CAPE TOWN TRAMWAY CO., P.C., 657; [1902] A. C. 381; 86 L. T. 457.

4. Injury—Nervous shock resulting from fright—Damages—Remoteness.—Damages for injuries which result from a nervous shock occasioned by fright, although unaccompanied by any actual physical impact, may be recovered in an action for negligence if such fright is followed by consequent physical damage to the plaintiff. Such damages are not too remote.

Victorian Railway Commissioners v. Coultas (37 W. R. 129, 13 App. Cas. 222) considered, and not followed.—DULIEU v. WHITE, K.B.D., 76; [1902] 2 K. B. 669; 70 L. J. K. B. 837; 85 L. T. 126

5. Third party, intervening act of—Liability—Effective cause of damage.—The defendants' servants shunted some vehicles on to a siding which was on an incline running down to a level crossing over a highway. The siding had a catch-point which would have prevented the vehicles if set loose from running down the incline, but, for the convenience of their shunting operations, the defendants' servants did not place the vehicles beyond the catch-point, but screwed down their brakes and left them in a position in which they would not have caused any damage if not interfered with. Some boys, however, trespassing on the siding, unscrewed the brakes and detached a vehicle, which ran down the incline and injured the plaintiff, who was lawfully passing along the highway over the level crossing. The defendants were aware that boys were in the habit of trespassing on the siding and meddling with vehicles placed upon it.

Held, that the defendants were liable for the damage sustained by the plaintiff, since they were aware of the danger of interference with the vehicles, and negligently omitted to take reasonable precautions to prevent the consequences of that interference.—MCDOWALL v. GREAT WESTERN RAILWAY CO., K.B.D.; [1902] 1 K. B. 618; 71 L. J. K. B. 330; 86 L. T. 558.

NEW SOUTH WALES, LAW of :—

1. Income tax—Deduction of fair rent in respect of Crown lease.—Held, under New South Wales Land and Income Tax Assessment Act, 1895, that respondent, who carried on the business of a grazier on land held under a Crown lease (and therefore exempt from land tax), was not entitled to deduct from the taxable amount of his income in 1899 a sum representing the fair rental value of the leasehold premises and improvements thereon for that year. The deduction is not authorized by section 28, the rental value not being an outgoing, loss, or expense within the meaning of that section.—COMMISSIONERS OF TAXATION v. ANTILL, P.C.; [1902] A. C. 422; 86 L. T. 783.

2. Land Tax—Glebe lands let on leases—User and occupation—Exemption from tax.—Held, that under the New South Wales Land and Income Tax Assessment Act, 1895, s. 11, glebe lands by Crown grant vested in the respondents for parochial church purposes in connection with the Church of England but let on building leases or sub-divided for that purpose were not exempt from assessment for land tax as being lands occupied or used exclusively in connection with public charitable purposes or a church.—COMMISSIONERS OF TAXATION v. ST. MARK'S GLEBE, P.C.; [1902] A. C. 416; 86 L. T. 629.

3. Lease—Suspension of pastoral lease—Compensation—New South Wales Mining Act, 1874 (37 Vict. No. 13), ss. 13, 25—Construction.—Held, that section 13 of the New South Wales Mining Act of 1874 is plain and unambiguous. It confers on the Governor power to suspend a pastoral lease so far as may be necessary for certain defined purposes relating to the public safety and welfare. That power is not confined to land uncultivated or unimproved, or to water flowing in a natural watercourse. The effect of suspension is that while it lasts, and so far as it extends, all the rights of the lessee derived from the lessor are in abeyance, and the lessor is in the same position as if the lease had never been granted, and accordingly can resume possession. The compensation to which the lessee is entitled is limited to the return or remission of rent, no provision being made for cases where compensation so restricted is inadequate:

Held, further, that the construction of section 13 cannot be controlled by section 25 which relates to a different subject.—COOK v. RICKETSON, P.C.; [1901] A. C. 588; 70 L. J. P. C. 113; 85 L. T. 1.

4. Practice—Appealable value—Issue as to appealable value to be decided by Court of Appeal—Admissibility of affidavits—New South Wales Mining Act, 1874 (37 Vict. No. 13), s. 115.—Section 115 of the New South Wales Mining Act, 1874, gives a right of appeal to the Supreme Court in mining cases where the amount involved is not less than £500.

Held, that the Supreme Court was wrong in refusing to hear an appeal on the ground that the value should be found and stated by the court appealed from, and could not be ascertained by themselves on affidavit.

5. Railway—Agreement to construct a railway jointly — Construction — Rights of joint owners.—Where two colliery companies agreed to construct a railway between their respective collieries and the Government railway, and by the New South Wales Act which empowered the same it was provided that the new railway should be open to the public upon payment of a toll to the two companies for every ton of goods carried for the public, and that owners and occupiers of lands traversed by the railway might construct branch railways communicating therewith,

Held, that, in the absence of prohibitive words in the agreement, either colliery company was at liberty to construct a branch railway and have its coal thence brought to the joint railway carried over it free of the toll, which was chargeable only to the public.—CALEDONIAN COAL CO. v. SEAHAM COLLIERY CO., P.C.; [1901] A. NEW ZEALAND, LAW of:—

1. Confiscation—Regrant of native lands—Trust—Construction of regrant.—The expression "to be held in trust" for a definite class of persons is not always sufficient to create an equitable right or obligation which can be enforced by legal proceedings.

Kinloch v. Secretary of State for India in Council, [1882] 7 App. Cas. 625, referred to.

By an agreement in 1870 between the Government of New Zealand and certain natives whose names were scheduled thereto (which agreement was afterwards incorporated in the Mohaka and Waikare District Act, 1870), it was provided that the blocks of lands in suit, over which the Government had by force of a proclamation in 1867 issued under the New Zealand Settlement Act, 1863 an absolute power of disposition, native titles having been thereby extinguished, should be allotted to T., a Maori chief, and held in trust by him "in the manner provided or hereinafter to be provided by the General Assembly for native lands held under trust." In a suit by the appellants against T.'s devisees thereof to declare that the said block was held by T. as a trustee for the loyal owners thereof according to native custom and usage the natives beneficially entitled thereto.

Held, that, under all the circumstances and notwithstanding the words of trust in the agreement, T. took absolutely and beneficially; and that the respondents were not affected by any trusts in favour of the appellants. The allottees of each block comprised in the agreement or their successors were the only persons beneficially entitled thereto. —TE TEIRA TE PAEA v. TE ROERA TAREHA, P.C.; [1902] A. C. 56; 71 L. J. P. C. 11; 85 L. T. 558.

2. Public Works Act, 1894—Land taken for public purposes — Compensation — Omission to challenge amount of claim—Power of court to grant relief.—Under the New Zealand Public Works Act, 1894 (58 Vict. No. 42), if land is required for public purposes, the Governor may, after the preliminary requirements of the Act have been complied with, declare by proclamation that the land is taken for the public work therein named, and the land thereupon becomes absolutely vested in the local authority. Any person claiming compensation may serve a notice of the claim upon the local authority, and "if the respondent does not, within sixty days after receiving such claim, give notice in writing to the claimant that he does not admit it the claimant may file a copy of his claim . . . in the Supreme Court; and such claim when so filed shall be deemed to be, and shall have the effect of, an award filed in the Supreme Court, and may be enforced in the manner provided": section 44. In a case in which the local authority had by inadvertence omitted to challenge a claim within the period prescribed by the Act,

Held, that the court had no power to give them relief against the statutory consequences of such omission.—MAYOR OF WELLINGTON v JOHNSTON; SAME v. LLOYD, P.C.; [1902] A. C. 396; 86 L. T. 538.

PARTNERSHIP:—

1. Action—Dissolution—Receiver—Judgment order in subsequent action against firm—Charging order.—By a judgment in an action in the Chancery Division the partnership carried on under the name of S. & Co. was dissolved, and a receiver and manager was appointed. Subsequently D., a creditor, without knowledge of these proceedings, sued the firm in the King's Bench Division on certain bills of exchange accepted by the firm for partnership purposes, and served one partner only, who entered an appearance, and obtained judgment for the sum due and costs. D. then having become aware of this action applied in it for leave to issue execution, notwithstanding the possession of the receiver, which leave was accordingly granted, and a charging order obtained. On a motion on behalf of the partner not served with the writ in the action in the King's Bench Division to discharge the charging order for irregularity,

Held, that the motion was, in effect, to obtain a declaration that the judgment of the King's Bench Division was void, and that there was no jurisdiction to so hold; that ord. 48A, rr. 1 and 3, were intended for the protection of the individual partner, and not of the assets of the firm; that, therefore, the order previously made in chambers would stand, and the motion be refused with costs. —BRAND v. SANDGROUND, Ch.D. Farwell, J.; 85 L. T. 517.

2. Articles—Partnership continued after period fixed for determination—Dissolution—Pre-emption clause—Whether applicable to partnership at will—Partnership Act, 1890 (53 & 54 Vict. c. 39), s. 27.—In an action for a declaration that the partnership between the plaintiff and defendant was dissolved by the issue of the writ, and that the plaintiff was entitled to exercise the rights conferred by clause 25 of the partnership articles for the purchase of the interest of the defendant, it appeared that by the articles the partnership was fixed for ten years from the 1st of January, 1889, unless sooner determined as therein provided. By clause 25 the plaintiff was to be at liberty to determine the partnership by giving the defendant six months' notice, and whether so determined or by effluxion of time she should have the right to purchase the share of the defendant at a valuation. Since the 1st of January, 1889, the partnership had been carried on on the like terms, as a partnership at will. At the hearing the defendant contended that the continued partnership was not a partnership at will, and that in any event clause 25 was now inapplicable.

Held, (1) that such continued partnership was a partnership at will, under section 27 of the Partnership Act, 1890; and (2) that having regard to the observations of Lord Watson in Neilson v. Mossend Iron Co., 11 App. Cas. 298, and the judgment of Stirling, L.J., in Daw v. Herring, 65 L. T. Rep. 782, clause 25 was not inconsistent with a partnership at will, and that accordingly the plaintiff was entitled to the declaration as asked.—BROOKS v. BROOKS, Ch.D. Farwell, J.; 85 L. 3. Contract with partner before partnership—Fraud of co-partner — Novation of original contract — Election—Partnership Act, 1890 (53 & 54 Vict. c. 39), ss. 10, 11 (a).—Where A. has entered into a contract with B., and B. and C. subsequently become partners, but A. elects to stand by the original contract with B., he cannot, by issuing a writ against B. and C., make an election to novate and render C. liable, it being, under the circumstances, unjust.—BRITISH HOMES ASSURANCE CORPORATION v. PATTERSON, Ch.D. Farwell, J., 612; 86 L. T. 826.

4. Solicitors—Profits—How ascertained.—In ascertaining the "profits" of a partnership, in the absence of special agreement to the contrary, the net profits of each year must be ascertained upon the footing of the moneys actually received and paid in that year without reference to when the work is done in respect of which the moneys are received.—BADHAM v. WILLIAMS, Ch.D. Kekewich, J.; 86 L. T. 191.

5. Vendor's right to indemnity on sale of share—Partnership Act, 1890 (53 & 54 Vict. c. 39), s. 31.—The purchaser of a share in a partnership business must indemnify the vendor against the liabilities of the business.—DODSON v. DOWNEY, *Ch D. PATENT :—

1. Invention previously patented abroad—International convention—Patent not ante-dated—Publication between date of foreign patent and English patent—Certificate as to particulars of objections—Particulars of document not an anticipation—Certificate as to validity—Invalid patent—Patents, &c., Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 57), ss. 29, 31, 103.—A patentee of an invention already patented in a foreign country (which is a party to the international convention), desiring to ante-date his English patent under section 103 of the Patents, &c, Act, 1883, must apply for that purpose within the seven months limited by the section, and subsequent application to ante-date is too late, even although the English patent is applied for within the seven months. If the patentee does not get his grant ante-dated, the court will treat its actual date as conclusive upon the question, and consequently publications prior to its date, though subsequent to the date of the foreign patent, may be proved as anticipations.

In a patent action a certificate that particulars of objections have been proven, or are reasonable and proper, will not be given as to particulars of documents which are used to prove common knowledge and not as anticipations.

Semble, particulars of documents which relate to the common knowledge before the patent, and which are not relied upon as anticipations, need not be given by the defendant.

In an action for infringement, which has failed, and in which the patent has been declared invalid, a certificate that the validity of the patent has come in question will not be given.

3. Prolongation—Petition by assignees—Expiration of foreign patents.—Where the petitioners were assignees and purchasers of a British patent as a commercial speculation, and their accounts did not disclose with any clearness the extent of the profits made either by the inventors or the petitioners,

Held, that prolongation must be refused, although the invention was one of great merit and worthy of exceptional consideration.

Hopkinson's Patent, [1897] A. C. 249, followed.

Saxby's Patent, (1870) L. R. 3 P. C. 292, followed.

Held, further, that the expiration of the foreign patents for the same invention and the failure of the British patentee to push the invention in this country for the first seven years of the life of the patent were serious, though not in themselves objections to a prolongation.

PEER:—

Title or dignity of honour acquired by marriage—Re-marriage to a commoner—Damage—Injunction.—The High Court has no jurisdiction to entertain questions of dignity.

A peer's wife obtained a divorce and then married a commoner, but continued, on a bonâ fide claim of right, to use her title as a peer's wife.

Held, (1) such questions are vested in the House of Lords, not as an appellate court from a court of law, but in its own inherent jurisdiction as the Committee for Privileges; (2) no legal wrong was committed by the lady so continuing to use her former title.

POLICE:—

Pension—"Annual pay"—Free rooms and fuel—Police Act, 1890 (53 & 54 Vict. c. 45), Schedule I., rr. 1, 11.—By the Police Act, 1890, a constable, after a certain number of years' approved service, is entitled to a pension, which is to be calculated on the amount of his "annual pay" at the date of his retirement.

A divisional inspector of police with his family resided free of rent at the police station, and had the free use of fuel, gas, and water,

Held, that the value of the free residence and fuel, gas, and water was not part of his "pay" for the purpose of calculating his pension.

When a constable appeals to quarter sessions, under section 11 of the Police Act, 1890, from the decision of the watch committee as to the amount of his pension, a case may be stated for the opinion of the King's Bench Division on a question of law.—GOODWIN v. SHEFFIELD CORPORATION, K.B.D.; [1902] 1 K. POOR LAW:—

1. Rating—Appeal—Valuation list—Appeal against subsequent rate—Second notice of objection to assessment committee—Union Assessment Committee Amendment Act, 1864 (27 & 28 Vict. c. 39), s. 1.—By 27 & 28 Vict. c. 39, s. 1, it is enacted that before any appeal shall be heard by any special or quarter sessions against a poor rate, the appellant shall give twenty-one days' notice in writing previous to the special or quarter sessions to which such appeal is to be made of the intention to appeal, and the grounds thereof, to the assessment committee: provided, that no person shall be empowered to appeal to any sessions against a poor rate made in conformity with the valuation list approved by the committee, unless he shall have given the committee notice of objection against the list, and shall have failed to obtain such relief in the matter as he deems just.

The appellants, having been assessed in May, 1900, to a poor rate in conformity with a valuation list, gave notice of their objection to the list, and the committee reduced the assessment but refused to do so to the extent claimed by the appellants. The appellants then appealed to special sessions, when the assessment was still further reduced, but not to the extent claimed by the appellants. A subsequent rate was made in October, 1900, which was not appealed against. In May, 1901, another poor rate was made, under which the appellants were assessed on the valuation decided by the justices in special sessions. The appellants appealed to quarter sessions against this rate, but gave no fresh notice to the committee, of objection to the valuation list upon which this rate was made. The justices refused to hear the appeal, on the ground that no proper notice had been given to the committee.

Held, on a rule for a mandamus to the justices, that no proper notice of objection to the valuation list had been given to the assessment committee before the second appeal was brought, and therefore such appeal could not be heard. Under section 1 of the Act of 1864 it is a condition precedent to an appeal that the appellant shall make an objection before the committee to the valuation list.

Where there is a second rate and a second appeal a second notice of objection to the valuation list must be given.

POWER:—

1. Appointment—General power—Exercise by will—Residuary gift—Lapse—Blending of funds.—A testatrix having, under her marriage settlement, a general testamentary power over certain securities, appointed by her will that the trustees of the settlement should hold the securities for certain appointees. She empowered the trustees to appropriate any security or investment subject to her power of appointment or belonging to her at the time of her decease towards payment of legacies, and as to the residue of her real and personal property she devised, bequeathed, and appointed the same, subject to payment of debts, to H. S., one of the said appointees, absolutely. H. S. died in the life-time of the testatrix

Held (Vaughan Williams, L.J., dissenting), that the testatrix intended to blend the settlement fund with her own property for all purposes, and that the lapsed share in the appointed fund passed under the gift of residue in her will.—MARTEN, RE, SHAW v. MARTEN, C.A., 209; [1902] 1 Ch. 314; 71 L. 15. Costs—Land compulsorily acquired—Payment into court—Default of vendor—Petition for payment out—Jurisdiction of court—Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845 (8 & 9 Vict. c. 18), s. 80—Supreme Court of Judicature Act, 1890 (53 & 54 Vict. c. 44), s. 5.—The mere absence of jurisdiction in the court to confer costs under a particular statute does not amount to an express prohibition by the Legislature so as to deprive the court of the discretion as to costs conferred by section 5 of the Judicature Act, 1890. The Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, s. 80, provides that the costs of all proceedings for the payment out of court of the purchase-money of lands compulsorily acquired shall be borne by the promoters of the undertaking, except where the payment into court has been rendered necessary by the wilful default of the vendor.

Held, that the court has jurisdiction to order the costs of a petition for payment out presented by the incumbrancers of a vendor, who had neglected to make a good title, to be paid by the promoters of the undertaking.—SCHMARR, RE, C.A., 245; [1902] 1 Ch. 326; 71 L. J. Ch. 219; 86 L. T. 71.

16. Costs—Lease—Forfeiture of lease—Vesting of property in underlessee—Inquiry—Conveyancing Act, 1892 (55 & 56 Vict. c. 13). s. 4.—Where a lease became forfeited by virtue of a proviso contained therein, and the court, acting under section 4 of the Conveyancing Act, 1892, made an order vesting the property in the underlessee, the underlessee was ordered to pay the costs of the inquiry that was necessary to determine the new rent.—EWART v. FRYER, Ch.D. Joyce, J.; 86 L. T. 676.

17. Costs—Payment into court with denial of liability—Recovery of less than amount paid in—Costs of issues found for plaintiff—R. S. C., 1883, ord. 22, rr. 1, 6.—In an action to recover damages for injuries arising from the negligence of the defendants, they denied the negligence and paid a sum of money into court with a denial of liability. The plaintiffs did not accept the money paid into court in satisfaction of their claim, and the action went to trial and resulted in a verdict for a less amount. The judge who tried the case ordered judgment to be entered for the defendants with the general costs of the action, and that the plaintiffs should have the costs of the issues found in their favour.

Held, that the questions, raised by the pleadings, whether the defendants had been guilty of negligence, and, if so, whether the money paid into court was sufficient, were distinct issues, and that the plaintiffs were entitled to their costs on the issue of negligence on which they had succeeded.—WAGSTAFFE v. BENTLEY, C.A.; [1902] 1 K. B. 124; 71 L. J. K. B. 55; 85 L. T. 744.

18. Costs—Security for costs—Insolvent company—Prosecution of company's appeal by receiver in debenture-holders' action—Security for costs of appeal—Reversal of judgment and order for payment out of security to receiver—Appeal to the House of Lords—Reversal of judgment of Court of Appeal—Repayment of security.—In June, 1898, H. & Co. obtained an order in the Court of Appeal against the cycle corporation for security for the costs of the appeal, and £100 was paid into court by the receiver as security, he having obtained leave in the debenture-holders' action to give security. Shortly afterwards H & Co. applied to the Court of Appeal that the receiver or the plaintiffs in the debenture-holders' action might be added as parties. The Court of Appeal refused this application, but ordered the security for costs to be increased by £100, and this sum was paid into court by the receiver, making £200 in all.

The appeal was heard in July, 1899, and was allowed with costs, and the £200 paid into court as security was ordered to be paid out to the receiver. H. & Co. appealed to the House of Lords, when the judgment of the Court of Appeal was reversed and the judgment of Phillimore, J., restored, and the cycle corporation were ordered to pay the costs of the proceedings in the Court of Appeal and in the House of Lords.

H. & Co., who held debentures in the cycle corporation and had liberty to attend the proceedings, took out a summons in this action asking that the receiver might be ordered to pay the costs recoverable by them under the order of the House of Lords, or in the alternative to pay to them the £200 paid out to him under the order of the Court of Appeal.

The court dismissed the appeal, and held (1) that the court had no jurisdiction to make the order; (2) that, assuming the court had jurisdiction, it was doubtful whether the court ought to exercise it.—GRIFFITHS CYCLE CORPORATION (LIMITED), RE, C.A.; 85 L. T. 776.

19. Costs—Security for—Insolvent plaintiff—Assignment for benefit of creditors—Assignment of cause of action—Nominal plaintiff.—The plaintiff, being insolvent and having brought an action against the defendants, executed a deed whereby he assigned to a trustee for the benefit of his creditors all his property, estate, and effects (with one insignificant exception), consisting of the goodwill and assets of his business of a tile and mosaic merchant, including the stock and book debts of the business, and also all the beneficial interest and property in the action brought by him against the defendants, but the right, property, or interest of the trustee therein was not to arise until judgment had been obtained or the plaintiff had effected terms of settlement. The plaintiff covenanted with the trustee to prosecute the action diligently against the defendants and not to arrange terms of settlement without the trustee's consent in writing and also to settle the action, if occasion should arise, upon such terms as the trustee should consider fair and reasonable.

Held, that the plaintiff was merely a nominal plaintiff suing for the benefit of third persons, and, therefore, that he must give security for the defendants' costs of the action.—LLOYD v. HATHERN STATION BRICK CO., C.A.; 85 L. T. 158.

20. Costs—Solicitor and client—Taxation—Disbursement—Estate duty—Solicitors Act, 1843 (6 & 7 Vict. c. 73), s. 37.—A payment for estate duty made by a solicitor on behalf of his client is not a "disbursement" within the meaning of section 37 of the Solicitors Act, 1843, and ought not to be included in his bill of costs.

In re Lamb, 37 W. R. 306, 23 Q. B. D. 5, overruled.—KINGDON AND WILSON, RE, C.A., 533; [1902] 2 Ch. 242; 71 L. J. Ch. 604; 86 L. T. 639.

21. Costs—Taxation—Co-defendants—Judgment against one defendant—Liability of one defendant for all plaintiffs' costs.—In an action against two defendants to restrain an infringement of copyright, the plaintiffs obtained an injunction with costs against one defendant, G., but failed to obtain any order against the other defendant, to whom, however, no costs were given. By the order, as drawn up, the defendant G. was directed to pay to the plaintiffs "their costs of this action"; the taxing-master allowed the plaintiffs all the costs of the action, including those incurred against the second defendant; the defendant G. objected that in this way he was unfairly made to pay the costs of the plaintiffs' unsuccessful attempt to fix his co-defendant with liability. The taxing-master overruled this objection, on the ground that the order did not direct him to make any deduction on account of the joinder of the second defendant. On a summons to review, Held, that the order was clear, that the taxing-master's view was correct, and that the defendant G. must pay all the plaintiffs' costs of the action — KELLY'S DIRECTORIES (LIMITED) v. GAVIN AND LLOYDS, Ch.D. Byrne, J.; [1901] 2 Ch. 763; 70 L. J. Ch. 786; 85 L. T. 399.

22. Costs—Taxation — "Disbursement" — Money paid to "Security for costs account"—Solicitors Act, 1843 (6 & 7 Vict. c. 73), s. 37.—Moneys paid by solicitors in conducting an action to the "Security for costs account" for discovery and interrogatories are "disbursements" within the meaning of the Solicitors Act, 1843, and are properly entered as such in a bill of costs.

23. Costs—Taxation—Examination of witness in London—Attendance of country solicitor—R. S. C., 1883, ord. 65, r. 27 (29); Appendix N. Item 147—R. S. C., January, 1902, r. 10.—By rule 10 of the R. S. C., January, 1902, regulation 29 of ord. 65, r. 27, was annulled, and the following regulation was substituted for it: "On every taxation the master shall allow all such costs, charges, and expenses as shall appear to him to have been necessary or proper for the attainment of justice or for defending the rights of any party."

Upon taxation of costs as between party and party the taxing-master allowed a sum of £12 12s. for the costs of the attendance of a country solicitor on the examination of a witness in London before the trial.

Held, that, under rule 10 of the Rules of January, 1902, the taxing-master had a discretion to allow this sum, though it exceeded the maximum authorized by the scale of fees in Appendix N, Item No. 147, to the R. S. C., 1883.—MCIVER & Co. v. TATE STEAMERS (LIMITED), C.A., 642; [1902] 2 K. B. 184.

24. Costs—Taxation—Order for payment of costs to successful party except so far as increased by certain issues—Affidavit relating both to general and to excepted issues.—The Registrar of Trade-Marks having granted an application by W., C., & Co. for the registration of their trade-mark, an appeal was brought by the R. Co., which was allowed by Bryne, J. (83 L T. Rep. 150, [1900] 2 Ch. 218). His lordship gave the costs of the appeal to the R. Co. except so far as they had been increased by certain issues, the costs of which were to be paid to W., C., & Co. Upon taxation of the costs, the taxing-master disallowed the costs of a witness who had filed an affidavit upon which he had been cross-examined. The R. Co. objected (inter alia) to the disallowance of these costs on the ground that the affidavit did not relate solely to the excepted issues. In his answer to objections the taxing-master overruled the objections. The R. Co. took out a summons to review taxation. Byrne, J. affirmed the decision of the taxing-master upon the ground that the evidence in question was unnecessary in any view of the case. The R. Co. appealed upon the ground that this evidence did not relate solely to the excepted issues; and that consequently the whole costs of the witness went to the appellants, the successful parties, on the principle of Brown v. Houston, 85 L. T. Rep. 160, [1901] 2 K. B. 855.

Held, that the decision of the taxing-master was perfectly right; and that the case of Brown v. Houston did not apply, because that was a common law action and the order in no way separated the issues, whereas in the present case the learned judge had distinctly separated the issues. — WRIGHT, CROSSLEY, & Co., RE, C.A.; 86 L. 25. Costs—Taxation—Order to tax costs and to include therein remuneration of receiver—Separate certificate as to costs only—R. S C, 1883, ord. 45, r. 27, sub-rule 25.—Under an order directing the taxing-master to tax the plaintiffs' costs of an action, including the remuneration of the receivers and managers appointed in the action, and to certify the balance after deducting certain costs of the defendants, the taxing-master has no power to make a separate certificate for the costs alone.—SILKSTONE AND HAIGH MOOR COAL CO. v. EDEY, C.A.; [1901] 2 Ch. 652; 70 L. 26. Costs—Taxation—Solicitor and client scale.—The taxation of the costs of parties as between solicitor and client should still in a proper case be expressly directed by the court, notwithstanding the provisions of the new regulation in the Rules of the Supreme Court, 1883, ord. 45, r. 27 (29) (January, 1902, r. 10).—BRADSHAW, RE, BRADSHAW v. BRADSHAW, Ch.D. S. C., 1883, ord. 19, r 6.—In an action against directors of a company claiming compensation under the Directors' Liability Act, 1890, in respect of untrue statements in the prospectus, the defendants by their defence said that they bonâ fide believed the statements to be true, and that they had reasonable grounds for their belief.

Held, that the defendants must deliver particulars of the grounds of their belief.—ALMAN v. OPPERT, C.A.; [1901] 2 K. B. 576; 70 L. J. Q. B. 745; 84 L. T. 828.

29. Discovery — Privilege — Solicitor and client— Evasion of statute.—Confidential communications between solicitor and client, which are not in themselves parts of a criminal or illegal proceeding, are privileged from disclosure, and this is not displaced by a mere allegation that certain documents were prepared "with intent to evade" the payment of duty. The word "evade" is ambiguous, and to displace such privilege there must be some definite charge.

31. Foreign judgment, action to enforce—Claim founded on alleged breach of agreement—Judgment signed in default of appearance against a British subject not resident in the country—Condition of agreement that all disputes should be submitted to foreign jurisdiction.—By a contract made in Belgium between the plaintiffs and the defendant, who was a British subject neither domiciled nor resident in in Belgium, it was agreed that all disputes should be submitted to Belgian jurisdiction. Disputes having arisen, the plaintiffs sued the defendant in in the Tribunal of Commerce, Ghent, the citation or summons being duly sent by registered post to the defendant's address in England, and recovered judgment in default of appearance.

Held, that, as the defendant had agreed to submit disputes arising out of the contract to Belgian jurisdiction, he was bound by the judgment of the foreign court.

Held, also, that whether in fact he received the citation by post was immaterial, as the proceedings were regular, and even if by some accident the citation did not reach the defendant, as he alleged was the case, it would be no answer to the action.

Held, without deciding whether the plaintiffs might or might not be entitled to make the necessary inspection and excavations at some time, that there was no sufficient evidence to justify the court in making any order on the motion.—BRADFORD CORPORATION v. FERRAND, *Ch.D. Held, that A., to whom the recipe had never been communicated, was not entitled, upon an application made under the liberty to apply given at the trial, to demand from B. either a copy or inspection of the secret recipe.

36. Leave to defend—R. S. C., 1883, ord. 14.—Unless the court is satisfied that the defendant has no defence, the plaintiff is not entitled to judgment under order 14. 37. New trial refused—No application for discovery —Cancelment of security by married woman for her husband's debts.—Held that the appellants could not enforce a charge on the respondent's share in her father's estate, obtained through their agent, who was also executor and trustee for her under her father's will, by pressure through her husband, whose debts were to be thereby secured, concealment of material facts, and without independent advice.

Held, further, that the appellants, who before the trial had made no application for discovery of documents, were not entitled to a new trial on the ground of an important document shown to have been accessible at the trial, if called for, having since come to their knowledge.—TURNBULL v. DUVAL, P.C.; [1902] A. In an action brought by him against H. and D. in respect of an alleged slander spoken by one defendant on one occasion and by the other defendant on another occasion, and also in respect of an alleged conspiracy between them wrongfully to dismiss him from his employment, Held, that these claims could not be joined in one action.—POPE v. HAWTREY, C.A.; 85 L. T. 263.

40. Parties—Substitution of plaintiff—Bonâ fide mistake—R. S. C., 1883, ord. 16, r. 2.—The plaintiff in an action to recover a balance due under a building contract had executed an assignment of all moneys due or to become due to him under the contract. On the trial of the preliminary question whether the assignment was such as to bar the plaintiff's right of action, the judge held that it was not an absolute assignment, and that the action might proceed, but the Court of Appeal held that it was an absolute assignment, and that therefore the plaintiff had no cause of action. In an application to substitute the assignees as plaintiffs in the action,

Held, that, as it was clear that there had been a bonâ fide mistake of law, there was jurisdiction under ord. 16, r. 2, to substitute the assignees as plaintiffs.—HUGHES v. PUMP HOUSE HOTEL CO. (No. 2), C.A., 677.

45. Payment out—Fund in court—Stop order—Agreement vesting "all property" of a bankrupt in trustees—Existence of fund not known at date of agreement—Vesting order.—"All the property" of a bankrupt was by an agreement, confirmed by an order of the court, vested in a company and the bankruptcy annulled. The agreement contained a list of the bankrupt's properties, which did not, however, include a fund in court, to which the bankrupt, unknown to any of the parties to the agreement or their solicitors, was then absolutely entitled. The late bankrupt subsequently obtained an order of the court for payment out to him of the fund upon affidavits that he had not incumbered. No stop order was ever obtained against the fund.

Held, that the agreement operated as a complete cessio bonorum of the bankrupt, and that he was liable to pay the amount of the fund to the company.

47. Set off—Equitable deduction—Vendor and purchaser—Specific performance—Costs—Debt en autre droit.—A purchaser obtained judgment for specific performance of a contract of sale against his vendor with costs. The vendor could only make title as administratrix of an intestate. The vendor was entitled beneficially as next-of-kin of the intestate to a portion of the proceeds of sale.

Held, on motion to retain the costs of the action out of the vendor's beneficial interest in the purchase-money, that the court having no power in this case to administer the estate of the intestate, the plaintiff purchaser could not bring into account all or any part of an unascertained sum to which the defendant might be beneficially entitled in the administration of her intestate's estate as against the purchase-money which was due to the defendant in her representative capacity.—PHILLIPS v. HOWELL, Ch.D. Byrne, J., 73; [1901] 2 Ch. 773; 71 L. J. Ch. 13; 85 L. T. 777.

48. Setting aside judgment—Allegation of fraud—Res judicata—Probate suit—Evidence.—A judgment obtained in a probate action may be set aside if it has been procured by the fraud of a party to the action, notwithstanding the innocence of other parties to the action having the same interest. But a party seeking to set aside a judgment on the ground of fraud must, in order to succeed, adduce evidence to show that there is a reasonable probability of the alleged fraud being established. Accordingly, where an action was brought to set aside a judgment granting probate of a will on the ground that since the judgment a document, which, however, could not have been put into evidence, had come into the hands of the police confessing that the will was a forgery.

Held, that the action ought to be dismissed, on the ground that the matter was res judicata.

49. Stay of execution pending appeal—Jurisdiction of Court of Appeal—R. S. C., 1883, ord. 58, rr. 16, 17.—The Court of Appeal has jurisdiction to hear an application for a stay of execution in a cause in which an appeal has been entered in that court, although no application for a stay has previously been made to the judge who tried the cause.—BROWN v. BROOK, C.A.; 86 L. T. 373.

50 Summons for directions—Interlocutory order to dismiss action—R. S. C., 1893, ord. 30, rr. 1, 2, 4, 5.—An order may be made in chambers on an application under the summons for directions to strike out a statement of claim as disclosing no reasonable cause of action and as frivolous.

An application so made to strike out a statement of claim is an interlocutory matter within the meaning of ord. 30, r. 5.—PEPPERELL v. HIRD, Ch.D. Byrne, J., 491; [1902] 1 Ch. 477; 71 L. J. Ch. 282.

51. Third-party notice—Service—Third party out of jurisdiction—Judicature Act, 1873 (36 & 37 Vict. c. 66), s. 24—R. S. C., 1883, ord. 11, r. 1 (g); ord. 16, r. 48.—To enable a third-party notice to be served out of the jurisdiction it must be such that if it were a writ it would be capable of being served out of the jurisdiction, and in determining whether the notice could be so served if it were a writ, the court will not have regard to the claim made by the plaintiff in the action, but will only consider the claim actually made by the defendant in the third-party notice.

In an action against the surviving trustee of a settlement leave was refused to the defendant to serve a third-party notice out of the jurisdiction on the executrix and residuary legatee of a former trustee, on the ground that, treating the third-party notice as an original writ, there was no action brought by the defendant against some other person properly served within the jurisdiction, so as to bring the case within ord. 11, r. 1 (g).—MCCHEANE v. GYLES (No. 1), C.A., 376; [1902] 1 Ch. 287; 71 L. 52. Writ—Service—Foreign corporation carrying on business within the jurisdiction—Stand at an exhibition—Head officer—R. S. C., 1883, ord. 9, r. 8.—A foreign corporation, who were manufacturers of motor-cars, rented for their exclusive use a stand at an exhibition in England for nine days for the purpose of exhibiting their goods, and sent over a person in their employment as their representative to look after the exhibits and to take orders for their goods.

Held, that the foreign corporation carried on business at the stand at the exhibition so as to be resident within the jurisdiction, and they could be sued in this country and the writ could be served on their head officer here.—DUNLOP PNEUMATIC TYRE CO. v. ACTIEN GESELLSCHAFT FUR MOTOR FAHRZEUGBAU. &c., C.A., 225; [1902] 1 K. 53. Writ—Service out of jurisdiction—"Breach of contract within jurisdiction"—Action for wrongful dismissal—Letter posted abroad to plaintiff in England—R. S C., 1883, ord. 11, r. 1 (e)—The plaintiff was employed by the defendant, who was a foreigner residing abroad, as the London correspondent of a newspaper, of which the defendant was the proprietor. The defendant wrote and posted abroad a letter addressed to and received by the plaintiff in England giving him two weeks' notice to terminate the employment. In an action for breach of contract and wrongful dismissal,

Held, that the alleged breach occurred abroad and not within the jurisdiction, and that therefore leave could not be given under ord. 11, r. 1 (e), to serve notice of the writ on the defendant out of the jurisdiction.

PRINCIPAL AND AGENT:—

1. Authority of agent—Ostensible authority—Holding out—Authority to pledge credit—Master and coachman—Authority of coachman to order forage.—The defendant employed a coachman under an arrangement whereby the coachman was to be paid a weekly sum, including the cost of foraging the defendant's horses. The coachman ordered forage for the defendant's horses from the plaintiff without mentioning the arrangement, and the plaintiff supplied forage accordingly for several months, giving credit to the defendant. The defendant duly paid the agreed weekly sums to his coachman, and did not know from whom he ordered forage.

Held, that the mere relation of master and coachman did not of itself involve as a matter of law ostensible authority on the part of the coachman to pledge the master's credit for forage supplied for the master's horses, and that there was no evidence of a holding out by the defendant of his coachman as having such authority.—WRIGHT v. GLYN, K.B.D, 402; [1902] 1 K. B. 745; 71 L. J. K. B. 497; 86 L. T. 373.

2. Commission—Agreement to pay commission on properties purchased—Property introduced to principal—Promotion by principal of company to purchase property—Liability of principal to pay commission.—The defendant brewery desired to acquire some public-houses in a particular district and agreed to pay the plaintiff commission on all licensed property they might purchase through his introduction. Subsequently the defendants abandoned that idea, and instead promoted a new company, which ultimately acquired certain licensed property originally brought to the notice of the defendants by the plaintiff.

Held, that as the new company was merely ancillary to the old, the commission was payable by the defendants.—GUNN v. SHOWELL'S BREWERY CO., C.A., 659.

3. Contract—Agreement by agent not to interfere with business after ceasing to be employed—Breaches—Liquidated damages—Injunction—Election.—The plaintiffs, an assurance company, appointed the defendant their agent under an agreement, in which it was provided that in the event of the defendant ceasing to act as such agent he should in no way give information about the company's connections or interfere either directly or indirectly with the company's business, or represent any other company doing a similar business within a radius of fifty miles from the headquarters of his agency within one year from the date of his ceasing to act for the plaintiff company, and that in case of the breach of the agreement in that behalf he should forfeit and pay to the plaintiffs a sum of £100 by way of ascertained and liquidated damages.

The defendant having committed breaches of the agreement, the plaintiffs brought an action against him and claimed the £100 liquidated damages and an injunction to restrain him from interfering with their business.

Held, that the plaintiffs were not entitled to an injunction as well as to the liquidated damages, but must elect between the two remedies.—GENERAL ACCIDENT ASSURANCE CORPORATION v. NOEL, K.B.D., 381; [1902] 1 K. B. 377; 71 L. J. K. B. 236; 86 L. T. 555.

4. Power of attorney—Forged signature—Transfer of stock—Stockbroker—Implied authority—Liability—Indemnity.—Any person who, by representing himself as having the authority of the principal, induces another person to enter into any transaction, into which he would not have entered but for the representation, is liable personally for the damage that occurs if the representation turns out to be untrue to the injury of the person to whom it was made. Thus a stockbroker who executes a transfer of stock as attorney under a power is liable for any loss occasioned by the fact that a signature on the power has been forged, though it has been forged without his knowledge and he honestly believed it to be genuine.

Decision of Kekewich, J. (49 W. R 391, [1901] 1 Ch. 652), affirmed.—OLIVER v. BANK OF ENGLAND, C.A., 340; [1902] 1 Ch. 610; 71 L J. Ch. 388; 86 L. T. 248.

5. Power of attorney—Power to borrow—Loan to agent—Money paid into principal's banking account—Misapplication by agent—Money had and received to use of lender.—A power of attorney authorizing an agent to purchase goods in connection with the business of his principal, and where necessary in connection with any purchases made on behalf of the principal or in connection with his said business, to draw and accept bills of exchange and sign the name of his principal to cheques on the banking account of the principal, does not confer on the agent a general power to borrow.

Money borrowed by the agent under such a power in the name of his principal and paid into the principal's banking account, and then drawn out by the agent and applied to his own purposes, cannot be recovered by the lender from the principal, as money had and received to the use of the lender, unless the principal knew, or could in the ordinary course of business have known, of the transaction, or unless the principal had the benefit of the money so paid into his account.

PRINCIPAL AND SURETY:—

1. Guarantee—Bond to secure fidelity of employee—Death of surety—Notice—Determination of liability.—Where a bond is given by a surety for the integrity of a person, in consideration of that person's being employed by the obligee of the bond, the liability of the surety will not, unless it be expressly so stipulated in the bond, be either determinable upon notice, or determined by his death.—CRACE, RE, BALFOUR v. CRACE, *Ch.D. PRISONERS:—

Legal custody of, during trial—Illegal detention by warder after acquittal—Liability of governor of prison.—The legal custody of prisoners during trial is in the governor of the gaol from which they have come or would have come if they had not been bailed; and consequently if after a prisoner has been acquitted and ordered to be discharged the warders unlawfully detain him, the governor is responsible for the illegal act although he may not have been present in court or ordered it.—MEE v. CRUICKSHANK, K.B.D.; 86 L. T. 708.

PROBATE:—

1. Administration bond—Intestate estates—Duchy of Lancaster—Death of holder of title—Death of administrator appointed by her—Nominee of her executors—Form of grant—Sureties dispensed with.—The court allowed the executors appointed under the will of her late Majesty Queen Victoria to nominate a person to take a number of grants for their use in the estates of persons who had died domiciled in the County Palatine of Lancaster, and which had been either wholly or partially unadministered.

The court, however, while consenting to dispense with sureties, required that, inasmuch as the administrator was not to take for the use of the sovereign, but for the use of the late sovereign's executors, he should enter into the usual administration bond.—BEST, IN THE GOODS OF, P.D. & Ad.D.; [1901] P. 333; 71 L. J. P. 9; 85 L. T. 640.

2. Administration—Bond—Signature of one surety—Substitution of name of second surety—Cancellation.—One surety to an administration bond executed the same on being assured that the other person named in it as co-surety would execute it. The latter refused to do so. The name of another surety was inserted in the bond, and this person executed it. The first surety did not assent to the alteration.

Held, that the bond was void and must be cancelled.—COWARDIN, IN THE GOODS OF, P.D. & Ad.D.; 86 L. T. 261.

3. Codicil — Mistaken reference to will already destroyed—Revival. — Where a testator refers by mistake in a codicil to a will, which has not only been revoked but actually destroyed at the time of the execution of such codicil, the court may, if satisfied that such reference is a pure mistake and that the testator intended to refer to an existing will, grant probate of the codicil, omitting the words of reference which have been inserted by mistake. But it is otherwise if the will referred to by mistake is in existence at the time of the execution of the codicil.—READE, IN THE GOODS OF, P.D. & Ad.D.; [1902] P. 75; 71 L. J. P. 45; 86 L. 4. Executors according to the tenor — Trustees — Directions for advancement and maintenance. — A testator directed payment of his debts and funeral and testamentary expenses by his executors hereinafter named, but failed to name any persons as executors. The will contained an expression of the testator's wishes as to the education and advancement of his children, and appointed the testator's widow and two of his sons as trustees.

Held, that the trustees were executors according to the tenor and entitled to probate.—KIRBY, IN THE GOODS OF, P.D. & Ad.D.; [1902] P. 188

5. Grant of administration—Executor, appointment of—Practice—Will of domiciled Italian—Probate refused—Administration with will annexed granted.—Even where the husband consents, the court will refuse to grant probate to the executor named in the will of a married woman, who dies domiciled abroad; but, with such consent, will make a general grant of administration with the will annexed.

6. Informal document—Execution—Witnesses dead—No attestation clause—No evidence of handwriting—Omnia præsumuntur rite esse acta.—The court extended the presumption of law—omnia præsumuntur rite esse acta—to the case of an informal holograph document containing no attestation clause and in regard to which there was no evidence to prove the handwriting of one of the persons, both of whom were dead, whose names appeared near the signature of the testatrix at the foot or end of the document.—PEVERETT, IN THE GOODS OF, P.D. & Ad.D.; [1902] P. 205.

7. Intervener—Probate action—Married woman—"Proceeding instituted"—Independent interest—Separate estate—Restraint on anticipation—Costs of opposite party—Form of order—R. S. C., 1883, ord. 12, r. 23—Probate Court Rules, 1862 (Contentious Business), r. 6—Married Women's Property Act, 1893 (56 & 57 Vict. c. 63), s. 2.—A summons by a married woman under R. S. C., 1883, ord. 12, r. 23, and Probate Court Rules, 1862, r. 6, for leave to intervene in a pending probate action for the purpose of asserting her independent interest in the subject-matter, is a "proceeding instituted" by her within section 2 of the Married Women's Property Act, 1893, and therefore the court has jurisdiction to order, if it thinks fit, the costs of the action, as from the date of the summons to intervene, to be paid out of her separate property, including property which is subject to a restraint on anticipation.

The fact that the married woman may have obtained an order giving her leave to intervene in the action "as a plaintiff," followed by a delivery to the defendant of a pleading whereby she "adopts the pleadings of the plaintiff," does not the less render her intervention a "proceeding instituted" by her within the section.—CRICKITT v. CRICKITT (CRICKITT INTERVENING), C.A.; [1902] P. 177; 71 L. J. P. 65; 86 L. T. 635.

8. Marriage—Foreign marriage—Ceremony performed by minister not of the same religious community as one of the contracting parties.—Although by the common and civil law of Western Europe a marriage per verba de præsenti was valid without the presence of a minister of religion, yet, notwithstanding that, municipal law has superadded the necessity of the presence of a minister as a witness,

Quære, whether such a marriage may or may not be considered valid according to the laws and rites of the Church of England, for Quære, whether the decision in Reg. v. Millis, 10 Cl. & Fin. 534, applies where the presence of an ordained minister of the Church of England cannot be procured.—LIGHTBODY v. WEST, P.D. & Ad.D., 494.

9. Mobilization—Wills Act (1 Vict. c. 26), s. 11.—Mobilization may be fairly taken as a commencement of that which, in Roman law, was understood by the words in expeditione. If the order to mobilize has been received, although any particular member of the force may himself have taken no step under it, yet the order itself so affects his position, as a unit of the whole force, as to place him in expeditione.

On the 7th of September, 1899, a battalion stationed in India was "warned" for service, and two days later was "ordered to mobilize" for active service in South Africa, and embarked on the 19th of September, 1899. The deceased, a private soldier in that battalion, wrote, between the 8th of September and the 19th of September, an undated letter, which was received by the plaintiff in England on the 2nd of October, 1899. The writer died of fever during the siege of Ladysmith on the 9th of February, 1900.

The letter contained (inter alia) the expression: "If you have a letter to say that I am killed, then the lot is for you." . . . "You will receive the lot if I am killed in action, for I shall make out my will in your favour."

No other document in the nature of a will was ever received or discovered, and the father of the deceased, the latter being unmarried, took out letters of administration.

The plaintiff having propounded the letter as the will of the deceased soldier, claimed revocation of the grant of administration:

Held, that the document was testamentary, and that it was a soldier's will within the meaning of section 11 of the Wills Act.—GATTWARD v. KNEE, P.D. & Ad.D.; [1902] P. 99; 71 L. J. P. 34; 86 L. T. 113.

10. Practice—Costs—Executors.—Executors, who are also residuary legatees, are in the same position, as to costs, as any other party who unsuccessfully propounds a will.

Where executors, who were also named as residuary legatees, had ample opportunities of forming an opinion as to the testamentary capacity of the deceased, and, acting upon their opinion, propounded a will or wills, which, in the result were pronounced against, after verdict of a jury, on the ground of testamentary incapacity and want of knowledge and approval of the contents,

Held, that not only was this a case in which their costs should not be allowed out of the estate, but that, following the general rule that costs follow the event, they should pay the costs of the defendant; but not of any of the parties cited, whose interests were practically identical with those of the defendant.

11. Practice — Costs — Probate suit. — Where a principal beneficiary takes instructions himself and causes a will to be prepared by a solicitor upon those instructions, but the solicitor does not see the testator, the circumstances so far invite inquiry as to justify the court in refusing to condemn in costs a party opposing probate of the will.—AYLWIN v. AYLWIN, P.D. & Ad.D.; [1902] P. 203.

12. Practice—Will torn in pieces and pasted together again—Persons not sui juris interested in intestacy—Probate, on motion, to executrix.—The court, upon motion by the sole executrix, granted probate of a will which had been torn up and afterwards pasted together again, notwithstanding the fact that the persons interested under an intestacy were not sui juris and no guardian ad litem had been appointed by the court to represent them.—BRASSINGTON, IN THE GOODS OF, P.D. & Ad.D.; [1902] P. 1; 71 L. RAILWAY:—

1 Compulsory powers—Right of way—Obstruction — Injunction — Compensation — Lands Clauses Act, 1845 (8 & 9 Vict. c. 18), s. 68.—Motion by plaintiff to restrain defendants from obstructing or interfering with the plaintiff's right of way over an occupation road and from permitting any railway to continue upon and from running trains or locomotives along the road. The defendants had laid down a line which passed along the occupation road and ran trains thereon for the purposes of carrying the plant and material necessary for the construction of the authorized new line.

Held, that the plaintiff was not entitled to an injunction, but that he had his remedy by compensation under the Lands Clauses Act, 1845, s. 68. —BARNARD v. GREAT WESTERN RAILWAY CO., Ch.D. Kekewich, J.; 86 L. T. 798

2. Dock company—Railway lines and sidings on docks — Communication with railway company — Through rates—Regulation of Railways Act, 1873 (36 & 37 Vict. c. 48), s. 3—Railway and Canal Traffic Act, 1888 (51 & 52 Vict. c. 25), s. 25.—The London and India Docks Co., constituted under powers conferred by various Acts of Parliament, had, under the provisions contained in such Acts, laid down lines of railway within ther docks, forming a junction with the lines of the Great Eastern Railway Co., and extending for a distance of about three miles to the various warehouses and quays of the docks, for the purpose of the carriage of goods in the trucks and wagons of the railway company to and from the railway company and the warehouses and quays, and had also constructed a group of sidings for the accommodation of the trucks, wagons, and engines used in such traffic.

The Acts under which the dock company was constituted did not, in respect of such lines and sidings, incorporate the provisions of the Railways Clauses Consolidation Acts or contain any of the usual statutory provisions relating to railways.

The dock company applied under section 25 of the Railway and Canal Traffic Act, 1888, to have through rates fixed by the Railway Commissioners in respect of the traffic from their warehouses and quays to certain places on the Midland Railway Co.'s system, viâ the Great Eastern Railway Co.'s lines.

Held, reversing the decision of the majority of the Railway Commissioners, that the dock company under the provisions of their Acts of Parliament were not a "railway company" nor were their lines and sidings part of a continuous line of railway communication within the meaning of the Railway and Canal Traffic Act, 1888, and, therefore, the dock company were not entitled to through rates under section 25 of that Act.

Semble, a railway company entitled to demand a through rate under section 25 must be a railway company constituted by statutory authority and owning a line which forms part of a continuous route, that section presupposing that the demanding company has itself a line which is to form a substantial part of the route.—LONDON AND INDIA DOCKS CO. v. GREAT EASTERN RAILWAY CO., C.A., 461; [1902] 1 K. 3. Negligence—Tort—Act authorized by statute—Canada (Quebec) Law of.—In the absence of negligence or misconduct, a corporation authorized by statute to carry on a particular business, is not responsible for any damage caused by its doing so in a normal and reasonable manner; for when the Legislature has legalized the acts contemplated and carried out, they cannot constitute an actionable wrong.—CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY CO. v. ROY. P.C., 415; [1902] A. 4. Sidings and collateral branches—Connection—Railways Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845 (8 & 9 Vict. c. 20), s. 76—Construction—Adjoining owners—Private branch railways—Private sidings—Openings for communication with railways—Railways Regulation Act, 1842 (5 & 6 Vict. c. 35), s 12.—Section 76 of the Railways Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, applies to the user of the railway by the owners of branch railways with their own engines and carriages, and does not entitle an adjoining owner, who makes a siding, to demand communication with the railway for the purpose of establishing a claim to facilities for his traffic.

Held, also, that the limitation of the right of communication between a railway and a private branch railway to places where the communication can be made with safety to the public, and without injury to the railway, and without inconvenience to the traffic thereon, does not relate solely to the structural difficulties of making an opening, but has reference also to difficulties arising from working the traffic on the railway.

5. Undue preference—Ultra vires—Rights of shareholder—Injunction—Jurisdiction—Railways Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845 (8 Vict. c. 20), s. 90—Railand Canal Traffic Act 1854 (17 & 18 Vict. c. 31), s. 2.—A shareholder of a railway company cannot have an injunction to prevent the company carrying goods for a customer at a lower rate than the ordinary scale, upon the ground that it is ultra vires, and enables other customers to claim reductions, and thus diminishes the profits of the company.

Semble, such an act, even if an undue preference, is not ultra vires the railway company.

Whatever rights a railway company may have against a customer who has delivered goods to them for consignment under an alleged erroneous description bearing a lower rate of charge than the proper description, a shareholder in the railway company has none against the customer.—ANDERSON v. MIDLAND RAILWAY CO., *Ch.D. RECEIVER:—

Practice—Public-house — Licences in jeopardy — Recovery of possession—Disputed title—Receiver of licences and of rents and profits—Landlord and tenant—Breach of covenant—Notice—Conveyancing and Law of Property Act, 1881 (44 & 45 Vict. c 41), s. 14.—The defendant was tenant of a public-house under an agreement, dated in 1893, whereby the plaintiffs agreed to let and the defendant agreed to take the premises for one year certain. Under the agreement the defendant was not to do, or cause or suffer to be done, any act, deed, or thing whereby the licence might be jeopardized, suspended, forfeited or lost; he was, upon quitting the premises, to assign over the licences to the plaintiffs; and he was to reside on the premises, and not to shut them up, or cause or suffer the same to be shut up, or the trading thereon to be suspended. It was thereby also agreed that if the tenant should commit any breach of the agreement, or the licences should be jeopardized, the tenancy should cease, and the landlords should have power at once, without notice or legal proceedings, to re-enter upon the premises and resume possession thereof. The defendant continued tenant upon the terms of the agreement until November, 1901, when he closed the house and went away.

In an action for recovery of possession and for a receiver, the court appointed a receiver of the licences and of the rents and profits, ordered the licences to be handed over to the receiver, and gave him possession of the premises so far as was necessary for the purposes of preserving the licences. —CHARRINGTON & Co. v. CAMP, *Ch.D. SALE OF GOODS:—

1. Goods stolen by servant—Title of purchaser—Conduct of master alleged as cause of fraud—Estoppel. —The appellants gave a written authority to a dock company to honour transfer or delivery orders of timber signed by their confidential clerk. The clerk assumed a false name, took an office, and obtained transfers of timber to himself under the assumed name. This timber he sold to the respondents, representing himself as the agent of another firm. In an action by the appellants for the value of the timber,

Held, that as the timber was stolen the respondents had no better title than the thief from whom they bought, and the appellants were not estopped from recovering the value on the ground that the clerk was invested with the powers of an owner, as there had been no representation made to the respondents by or on behalf of the appellants, the respondents never having dealt with the clerk in his own name and having no knowledge of the appellants' connection with the transactions.—FARQUHARSON v. KING, H.L.; [1902] A. C. 325; 71 L. J. K. B. 667; 86 L. T. 810.

2. Stipulation—Condition precedent—"Specification to be given at the beginning of May"—Delay—Repudiation.—The defendants agreed to sell and deliver to the plaintiffs 1,000 tons of iron.

By the sale note it was provided: "Delivered . . . cost and freight Japan, direct port, specification to be given in the beginning of May. Time of shipping May and June from Antwerp."

It was known by both parties that the specification had to be sent from Japan, and, in fact, the specification was given in various parts between the 12th and 15th of May.

All the iron could be manufactured by the defendants in eight days, and opportunities of shipment in May and June were frequent from Antwerp to Japan.

Held, that "specification to be given in the beginning of May" was not a condition precedent, a breach of which entitled the defendants to repudiate the contract, but that, even if it was, the giving of the specification between the 12th and the 15th of May was sufficient compliance.

Whether or not a term of a contract is a condition precedent must be collected from the provisions of the instrument creating the contract and the circumstances legally admissible in evidence with reference to which it is to be construed.—KIDSTON v. MONCEAU IRONWORKS Co., K.B.D.; 86 L. T. 556.

SEDUCTION:—

Master and servant—Evidence of service—Employment by defendant—Weekly leave of absence—Visits to the father's home—Assistance in household duties. —The plaintiff's daughter, who was in the service of the defendant, was permitted to go out once a week for an afternoon and evening. On such occasions she went to her father's house and assisted in household duties. In an action by the plaintiff for the seduction of his daughter by the defendant while she was in the latter's service, Held, that there was no evidence of the relation of master and servant between the plaintiff and his daughter to support the action.—WHITBOURNE v. WILLIAMS, C.A.; [1901] 2 K. B. 722; 70 L. J. K. B. 933; 85 L. T. 271.

SETTLED LAND:—

1. Capital money—Improvements in leasehold houses with a view of letting—Electric light installation—Settled Land Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 38), s. 25—Settled Land Act, 1890 (53 & 54 Vict. c. 69), s. 13 (ii.). — An electric light installation may, under special circumstances, be so necessary to enable a house to be let as to be payable out of capital moneys under the Settled Land Acts.—FREAKE'S SETTLEMENT, RE, KINNAIRD v. FREAKE, Ch.D. Joyce, J., 237; [1902] 1 Ch. 97; 71 L. J. Ch. 20; 85 L. T. 454.

2. Capital money—Investment—Powers of a tenant for life—Choice of brokers—Duties of trustees—Settled Land Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 38), s. 21, sub-sections 1, 10; s. 22, sub-section 2; s. 31 (vi.).—A tenant for life has no power under the Settled Land Acts to direct the trustees to employ a particular broker nominated by him. The choice of a broker lies with the trustees.

After a sale of settled estates a tenant for life entered into negotiations with a firm of brokers for the investment of the proceeds of sale. The trustees refused to employ the broker nominated by the tenant for life, and desired the transaction to be carried through by their bankers, who would employ their own brokers. The tenant for life then asked that the trustees might be directed to apply the capital moneys in their hands in the purchase, through the brokers nominated by the tenant for life, of such investments, authorized by the Act, as the tenant for life might direct.

Held, that the trustees, and not the tenant for life, were the proper persons to select and employ a broker, just as they were the proper persons to select and employ a solicitor or banker.—CLEVELAND'S (DUKE) SETTLED ESTATES AND SETTLED LAND ACTS, 1882-1890 Ch.D. Joyce, J., 508; [1902] 2 Ch. 350; 86 L. T. 678.

3. Capital money—Leasehold house—Additions with a view to letting—Electric light installation—Settled Land Act, 1890 (53 & 54 Vict. c. 69), s. 13 (ii.).—The word "additions" in section 13 (ii.) of the Settled Land Act, 1890, means structural additions.

The installation of the electric light in a leasehold house, although reasonably necessary to enable the house to be let, is not a structural addition within the meaning of the section, and cannot, therefore, be paid for out of capital moneys.

4. Conflict between provisions of will and provisions of Settled Land Acts—Consent—Undivided shares—Settled Land Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 38), s. 56 (2)—Settled Land Act, 1884 (47 & 48 Vict. c. 18), s. 6 (2). —If lands are settled in undivided shares, a power of sale of the whole given to the trustees will conflict with the powers of sale of their shares possessed by the tenants for life under the Settled Land Acts, and cannot be exercised without the consent of all the tenants for life of undivided shares. Each of such persons is merely tenant for life of his undivided share, so that the consent of one of them would not be sufficient under section 6 (2) of the Settled Land Act, 1884, to enable the trustees to sell the entirety.—OSBORNE & BRIGHT'S (LIMITED), RE, Ch.D. Kekewich, J., 468; [1902] 1 Ch. 335; 71 L. J. Ch. 285; 86 L. T. 178.

5. Equitable tenant for life—Condition requiring residence—Power of sale — Trustee—Compromise—Settled Land Act, 1882, s. 51—Trustee Act, 1893, s. 21.—Where there was an equitable tenant for life of a house, valued at £320 a year, subject to a condition requiring residence, and some of the remaindermen were infants, the court being of opinion that the condition was not void under section 51 of the Settled Land Act, 1882,

Held, that the court could sanction an agreement between the tenant for life and the trustees whereby the tenant for life should release to the trustees her life estate in the house in consideration of their paying to her out of the general trust estate an annuity of £275.

6. Investment of capital moneys—Tenant for life—Trustees for purposes of Settled Land Acts—Duty of trustees—Settled Land Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 38), s. 22 (2).—When a tenant for life under section 22 (2) of the Settled Land Act, 1882, directs trustees for the purposes of the Settled Land Act to invest capital money upon a mortgage, the trustees must be satisfied that such direction has been given upon a proper report as to the value of the property proposed to be mortgaged, or that a proper investigation of the title has been made and proper advice given as to the form of the conveyance, but on being so satisfied they are bound to comply with the direction.

7. Lease—Fine on surrender of lease—Tenant for life and remainderman—Capital or income.—In the absence of mala fides, money paid to a legal life tenant as the consideration for accepting the surrender of a lease, granted without recourse to the powers of the Settled Land Acts, belongs to him as a casual profit.—HUNLOKE'S SETTLED ESTATES, RE, FITZROY v. HUNLOKE, *Ch.D. 8. Lease—Void or voidable—"Best rent"—Collusive bargain for reduction of rent—Purchaser for value without notice—Doubtful title—Settled Land Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 38), s. 7, sub-section 2; s. 54.—A tenant for life, purporting to act under the powers of the Settled Land Act, 1882, granted a building lease of some vacant land at less than the best rent that could reasonably be obtained, the rent having been reduced in consideration of the waiver by the lessee of a claim for damages against the lessor, and the lessee covenanted to lay out a certain sum in building. The lessee neglected to build, and the lease was sold by auction to the vendor at a large price. The vendor agreed to sell at an enhanced price to the purchaser, and the purchaser objected that, having regard to the amount of the price, it must be shown that the rent reserved by the lease was the best that could reasonably be obtained within section 7, sub-section 2 of the Settled Land Act. The vendor had no knowledge of the arrangement between the lessor and the lessee as to the reduction of the rent, and he insisted that, as purchaser for value without notice, he could make a good title to the purchaser.

Held, by Buckley, J., that, inasmuch as the lease did not comply with the statutory requirements as to rent, and the lessee did not act in good faith within section 54, it was bad, and could be set aside as against a purchaser for value without notice.

Held, by the Court of Appeal, on the authority of Freer v. Hesse, [1853] 4 De G. M. & G 495, that, assuming that the lease was voidable only and not void, the title was not such as ought to be forced upon the purchaser, since it depended on a doubtful question of fact, namely, whether his predecessor in title, the vendor, purchased without notice of the defect in the title.—HANDMAN AND WILCOX'S CONTRACT, RE, C.A.; [1902] 1 Ch. 599; 86 L. 9. Leasehold houses—Repairs which are improvements—Capital or income—Discretion of the court—Settled Land Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 38), s. 22 (2)—Settled Land Act, 1890 (53 & 54 Vict. c. 69), s. 15. — As between the tenant for life equitably entitled to the rents and profits of leasehold houses subject to the performance of the covenants in the leases under which they are held, and the persons equitably entitled in remainder thereto, the cost of "improvements" which are also repairs within the covenants contained in the leases, must be borne by the tenant for life.

Clarke v. Thornton, 35 W. R. 603, 35 Ch. D. 307, distinguished.

In the exercise of its discretion under section 15 of the Settled Land Act, 1890, the court will not direct such repairs to be paid out of capital if the settlor has provided that they should be paid out of income.

10. Mining lease—Varying minimum rent—Way-leave—Settled Land Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 38), ss. 6, 7, 9, 53.—The object of the Settled Land Acts is to remove restrictions in dealing with settled land, and though the interests of the remaindermen are to be considered, a possible disadvantage to the remaindermen ought not to be allowed to put a stop to the development of the estate. There is nothing in the Settled Land Acts which makes it necessary that the minimum rent reserved in a mining lease should be uniform or that it should be reserved from the commencement of the term, consequently a mining lease may be granted reserving a minimum rent which does not commence in the first year of the term, and which gradually increases year by year.

A mining lease may also contain a grant of a way-leave, for which no separate rent is reserved, and which is to continue after the rent has ceased on the working out of the coal.

11. Power of tenant for life to mortgage—Costs of consolidating mortgage—"Where money is required"—Settled Land Act, 1890, s. 11.—Section 11 of the Settled Land Act, 1890, must be read as if it meant

"where money is reasonably required having regard to the circumstances of the settled land."

Where land was settled subject to several mortgages, all bearing interest at 4 per cent., and the tenant for life had a right under the settlement to resort to capital in the event of the income payable to her falling below a certain figure, and one of the mortgages was called in, and it was found that that mortgage could not be readily transferred, but that a consolidating mortgage for the whole amount due under all the mortgages could be got at 3½ per cent. interest.

Held, that the tenant for life was empowered by the 11th section of the Act of 1890 and was justified in raising the amount by which the costs of the consolidating mortgage exceeded the costs of the transfer of the mortgage called in by a mortgage of the settled land for that amount.—CLIFFORD, RE, SCOTT v. CLIFFORD, Ch.D Buckley, J., 58; [1902] 1 Ch. 87; 71 L. 12. Tenant for life—Capital moneys—Expenses of improvement and development of building estate—Rebuilding of mansion-house—Dry-rot—Salvage—Settled Land Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict c. 38) s. 25—Settled Land Act, 1890 (53 & 54 Vict. c. 69), s. 13, sub-section 4.—Where the principal mansion-house on settled land had been rebuilt owing to dry-rot, and additions and improvements had at the same time been made to the house, and the gross expenses (being more than one-half the annual rental of the settled estates) had been paid by the tenant for life.

Held, on a summons by him for recoupment, that such part of the expenditure as was not in excess of one-half the annual rental of the estates was payable out of capital under the Settled Land Act, 1890, section 13, but that no part of the excess could be allowed by way of salvage.—LEGH'S SETTLED ESTATES, RE, Ch.D. Kekewich, J., 570; [1902] 2 Ch. 274; 71 L. J. Ch. 668; 86 L. T. 884.

13. Tenant for life—Sale of option—Unauthorised by Settled Land Acts, 1882 to 1890.—In 1887 a water company entered into a contract with a tenant for life, acting under the powers conferred by the Settled Land Acts, 1882 to 1890, for the purchase of a plot of settled land with the object of erecting thereon certain buildings for the purposes of their undertaking, and agreed to enter into a covenant not to build thereon or let it for building otherwise than for the purpose of their undertaking. They promoted a Bill in Parliament for power to erect the proposed buildings, which was thrown out before the conveyance was executed, and thereupon requested the vendor to agree to the omission from the conveyance of the covenant restrictive of building on the plot sold. The vendor, however, insisted on a conveyance in accordance with the contract, but entered into an agreement with the company, to which the trustees of the settlement were parties, to the effect that if the company should not require the land for the purposes of their undertaking and should desire to erect other buildings thereon or to sell or let the same and thereof should give notice to the vendor, then the vendor would on payment of £10 consent to the company building upon or selling the land without the restriction as to building contained in the conveyance, which agreement, although dated the day after the conveyance, was executed simultaneously and formed one transaction with it. The vendor died, and was succeeded by his son as tenant in tail of the settled land, who possessed lands adjoining the plot sold. The company then gave the notice and tendered to him £10 in accordance with the agreement, but he declined to give his consent, alleging that he was not bound thereby. On a special case stated by consent of the parties under ord. 34, r. 1,

Held, that the vendor as tenant for life of the settled land had no power under the Settled Land Acts, 1882 to 1890, to enter into such an agreement with the company, which therefore was not binding on his successors in title.—PALMER v. GRAND JUNCTION WATERWORKS CO., Ch D. Swinfen Eady, J.; 86 L. T. 352.

14. Will—Future trust for sale—Trust arising after death of trustee—Trustee tenant for life—Trustees for the purposes of the Settled Land Acts, 1882 to 1890—Settled Land Act, 1890 (53 & 54 Vict. c. 69) s. 16 (ii).—Trustees for the time being of a "settlement" with a future trust for sale are trustees for the purposes of the Settled Land Acts, 1882 to 1890, under section 16, sub-section (ii.) of the Act of 1890, and it is immaterial that one of them is a person who cannot in fact ever exercise the trust for sale by reason that he will necessarily be dead before the trust takes effect.

One of two trustees of a "settlement" with a future trust for sale is a trustee for the purposes of the Settled Land Acts, notwithstanding that he is tenant for life of the "settlement."

A. and B. were trustees of settled land with a trust for sale to take effect after the death of A., who was the tenant for life.

Held, that under section 16 (ii.) of the Settled Land Act, 1890, A. and B. were trustees for the purposes of the Settled Land Acts, 1882 to 1890.—JACKSON'S SETTLED ESTATE RE, Ch.D. Buckley, J., 235; [1902] 1 Ch. 258; 71 L. J. Ch. 154; 85 L. T. 625.

SETTLEMENT:—

1. Covenant to settle after-acquired property—"Usual" clauses—Married woman—Agreement for a settlement—Reversionary interest in personalty subject to power of appointment—Exercise of power.—By the marriage settlement of M., dated in 1854, property was settled upon trust, after the deaths of himself and his wife, for the children of the marriage as M. and his wife should jointly appoint, and in default of such appointment, as the survivor should appoint; and in default of any appointment, in trust for all the children who should attain twenty-one in equal shares. There were only two children who attained twenty-one. One of them, C., by an ante-nuptial agreement, agreed to settle "all her half or other share and interest whatsoever" in the property subject to the trusts of the original settlement. The agreement provided that the settlement should contain certain specified provisions, and generally such other agreements, clauses, and provisions as were "usually inserted in settlements of a like kind." M. and his wife, who predeceased him, made no joint appointment under the deed of 1854, but by his will, in exercise of his power, he appointed the sum of £2,000 to C. absolutely:—

Held, that a covenant to settle after-acquired property was not a "usual" clause in settlements of a like kind with that to be executed in accordance with the agreement for a settlement, and that the £2,000 was not bound by the agreement.—MADDY'S ESTATE, RE, MADDY v. MADDY, Ch.D. Joyce, J.; [1901] 2 Ch. 820; 71 L. J. Ch. 18; 85 L. T. 341.

2. "Die without having been married"—Wife's property—Ultimate trust for next-of-kin—Construction of settlement.—By a marriage settlement in 1847, certain funds were settled on usual trusts for the husband and wife and the children of the marriage, and as to one moiety, in the event (which happened) of the wife dying in the lifetime of the husband, and after the determination of his interest therein, upon such trusts as the wife should by will or codicil appoint, and in default of appointment "upon trust for such person or persons as under the Statute for the Distribution of Intestate's Effects should or would have been entitled to her personal estate" in case she had died intestate without having been married." The wife died intestate in the lifetime of the husband, leaving an only son, who died an infant.

Held, that the case was governed by Wilson v. Atkinson, [1864] 4 D. J. & S. 455; that in conformity with that decision the words referring to death "without having been married" must be construed as intended to exclude the husband, and not as intended to exclude a child, and that therefore on the death of the wife intestate her infant son became entitled as her sole next-of-kin.—MARE, RE, MARE v. HOWEY, Ch.D. Kekewich, J.; [1902] 2 Ch. 112; 71 L. J. Ch. 649.

3. House — Repairs — Salvage — Jurisdiction to sanction expenditure out of capital.—The jurisdiction of the court to sanction expenditure in the repair of settled property out of capital is to be exercised, if at all, only where a case of salvage is clearly made out.

4. Husband entitled jure mariti to wife's reversionary personalty — Ante-nuptial agreement for settlement—Post-nuptial settlement—Recital of agreement — Husband's interest made determinable on bankruptcy—Fraud on creditors—Trustee in bankruptcy—Statute 13 Eliz. c. 5—Statute of Frauds.—A reservation, in a post-nuptial settlement of a wife's reversionary property, of a life interest to the husband, determinable on his bankruptcy, does not avoid the settlement in toto against his trustee in bankruptcy, in the absence of evidence that he was in embarrassed circumstances at the date of the settlement or contemplated entering on a speculative business. A recital in a post-nuptial settlement of an ante-nuptial agreement for settlement is evidence of such agreement sufficient to satisfy the Statute of Frauds.

5. Investment—Proceeds of realization of insufficient security—Tenant for life and remainderman—Apportionment.—Funds subject to the trusts of a settlement comprised a mortgage security which, pursuant to the trusts, was transferred to the trustees. The interest was irregularly paid, and ultimately the security was realized at a considerable loss.

Held, that the sum realized ought to be apportioned between the tenant for life and remaindermen under the settlement in proportion to the amounts due at the date when it was recovered in respect of arrears of interest and in respect of principal.

The principle of In re Moore, (1885) 54 L. J. (Ch.) 432; 33 W. R. 447. preferred to that of In re Foster, (1890) 45 Ch. D. 629.—ALSTON, RE, ALSTON v. HOUSTON, Ch.D. Kekewich, J.; [1901] 2 Ch. 584; 70 L. J. Ch. 869.

6. Several estates comprised in same devise—Tenant for life—Remaindermen—Interest on charges—Current rents and profits—Insufficiency—Arrears of interest—Subsequent rents—Payment off of charges—Apart from any question arising upon the special terms of the instrument creating the settlement, a tenant for life must keep down the interest accruing during his lifetime on all paramount incumbrances to the extent and out of the rents and profits received by him. If the current rents are insufficient to keep down the interest, subsequent rents arising during the life of the tenant for life are applicable to liquidate arrears accruing during the same life tenancy: Revel v. Watkinson, (1748) 1 Ves. Sen. 93; Tracy v. Viscountess of Hereford, (1786) 2 Bro. C. C. 128; Caulfield v. Maguire, (1845) 2 J. & Lat. 141.

Where several estates are includeded in the same settlement, the tenant for life is bound, out of the whole rents and profits, to keep down the interest on charges on all the estates: Frewen v. Law Life Assurance Society; [1896] 2 Ch. 511; In re Hotchkys 1886) 32 Ch. D. 408.

Upon principle, therefore, a tenant for life of several estates included in the same devise is liable, as between himself and the remaindermen, to make good arrears of interest accrued during his life tenancy out of subsequent rents received by him from any of the estates, even although the charge in respect of which the arrears have arisen has been paid off by means of a sale of part of the property.—HONYWOOD v. HONYWOOD, *Ch.D. 7. Tenant for life—Covenant to settle after-acquired property—Reversionary interest—Conversion for benefit of persons entitled in succession—The rule in Howe v. Earl of Dartmouth (1802) 7 Ves. 137; 6 R. R. 96, does not apply in the case of a settlement by deed and apparently only applies where there is a disposition by will of residuary personal estate given as one fund to be enjoyed by several persons in succession.—VAN STRAUBENZEE, RE, BOUSTEAD v. COOPER, *Ch.D. amount of remuneration payable for service rendered by one of the insured vessels to another shall be determined by a committee of the associations so concerned, if such agreement is to bind the master and crew of the salving vessel,

The court will require cogent proof that the salvors did in fact agree to be bound by such agreement.

Quære, whether such a contract might not be contrary to the provisions of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894.—"MARGERY," THE, P.D. & Ad.D., 654; [1902] P. 157; 71 L. J. P. 83.

19. Salvage—Injury to salving vessel—Compensation—Onus probandi—Appeal from Constantinople.—Where the vessel of a salvor has without default on his part been injured in the performance of salvage services, compensation may be awarded to him in respect of the injury so sustained and damages consequent thereon; or the salvage may be assessed on a liberal scale, so as to cover the loss and afford an adequate reward for the services rendered.

Held, also, that the presumption is that the injury is caused by the necessities of the services, and that the onus probandi is on those who allege default by the salvors. The amount of compensation awarded by the court below will not be reduced unless it appears to be grossly in excess of what is right.—MASTER AND OWNERS OF STEAMSHIP "BAKU STANDARD" v. MASTER AND OWNERS OF STEAMSHIP "ANGÈLE," P.C.; [1901] A. 20. Salvage—Lifeboat crew—Assistance taken by salvors against consent of master of salved vessel.—Where it was the duty of a tug to tow a lifeboat out to vessels in distress, and the tug assisted in salving such a vessel with the lifeboat made fast to the distressed vessel,

The court held that the crew of the lifeboat were entitled to be treated in regard to the salvage award as though they formed part of the crew of the tug.—"AUGUSTE LEGEMBRE," THE, P.D. & Ad.D. 622; [1902] P. 123; 71 L. J. P. 53; 86 L. T. 358.

21. Salvage—Subsequent damage—Maritime liens—Priority of claims.—Maritime liens are either liens arising ex delicto or liens arising ex contractu or quasi ex contractu. Liens arising ex delicto take precedence over prior liens arising ex contractu. Liens arising ex contractu must, in general, rank in the inverse order of the attachment of the res. The right of salvage may, but does not necessarily, arise out of contract. Salvors, from the time of rendering salvage services, are practically in the same relative position as a creditor who has obtained a lien strictly ex contractu, but while taking precedence over prior claims ex contractu and prior salvages, yet their claims ought to be postponed to subsequent damage claims, and even if the damage may not have given rise to a maritime lien, but only to a right to proceed in rem, nevertheless that right is enforceable in priority to salvage claims and for all practical purposes in cases where damage comes last the position of the injured party, so far as regards claims arising prior to the damage, is much the same whether one has a lien or only a right of process. Moreover, the right to arrest a ship to obtain reparation for damage done by her is not affected by prior claims against her from hypothecation which create interests in her along with those of her owners. A salvage claim is but, as it were, a hypothecation to secure the reward to the salvors for services rendered, and that reward ought not to be recovered against the res to the detriment of a claimant in respect of subsequent damage—"VERITAS," THE P.D. & Ad.D., 30; [1901] P. 304; 70 L. Held, that the above sub-section applies only to British ships, and does not make it an offence to persuade a seaman to desert from a foreign ship.—POLL v. DAMBE, K.B.D., 28; [1901] 2 K. B. 579; 70 L. J. K. B. 721; 84 L. T. 870.

Held, that in the absence of evidence that the risk of navigating the vessel in her then state was such as would have justified the crew breaking their articles abroad, the agreement was not one that could be enforced.—HOPKINS v. MCBRIDE, K.B.D., 255.

SOLICITOR:—

1. Breach of trust—Mortgage—Transfer of solicitor's own security—Insufficient security.—In July, 1892, the trustees of an indenture of settlement, dated the 3rd of September, 1890, had a fund of £1,100 for investment. By an indenture dated the 15th of February, 1877, a sum of £2,100 had been secured, but part of the mortgaged premises had been sold for £1,000. The balance consisted of three brick and stucco houses, held for ninety-nine years at a ground rent of £9 2s. 6d. S., the solicitor of the trustees, transferred this mortgage to the trustees and received the £1,100, without explaining what he was doing. It was alleged that at this time the property, which was in one of the worst districts in the town, was only worth £200, and the evidence for the defence did not prove that it was worth more than £600 in 1892. S. paid interest until his death, and this action was brought by the trustees claiming that the security should be realized and the balance made good by S.'s executor. The Trustee Act did not apply, it was said, as S. retained the money and converted it to his own use. For the defendant it was said the claim was one for negligence, and was barred by the Statute of Limitations. The money was not still held by a trustee. Even if S. ought to have had a valuation made, his omission to do so was a mere common law tort.

Held, that the property was now, and also at the date of the transfer, an insufficient security for £1,100, and that the solicitor had transferred a security belonging to himself with knowledge that to take the security involved a breach of trust; that the trustees never knew the facts, and that S. had received the £1,100 as cash, and that the defendant, admitting assets, an order must be made for the realization of the security, and that the defendant must make up the deficiency and pay the costs of the action.—MITCHINSON v. SPENCER, Ch.D. Swinfen Eady, J.; 86 L. T. 618.

2. Certificate—Registrar of Solicitors—Discretion cretion of registrar to refuse certificate—Discretion of judge—Undischarged bankrupt—Solicitors Act, 1843 (6 & 7 Vict. c. 73), ss. 23, 24.—The Registrar of Solicitors has no discretion to refuse to issue an annual practising certificate under section 23 of the Solicitors Act, 1843, on the ground that the solicitor applying for it is an undischarged bankrupt. Neither has the judge such a discretion under section 24 of that Act.

In re An Application under the Solicitors Act, 1843, 47 W. R. 575, overruled.—SOLICITOR, A, RE, C.A., 196; [1902] 1 K. B. 128; 71 L. J. K. B. 36; 85 L. T. 619.

3. Client—Commission received by solicitor with knowledge of client—Bargain with client—Independent advice.—A solicitor may bargain with his client provided that the client is fully informed and duly and honestly advised, so that the solicitor and client are substantially at arm's length and on an equal footing, though he may not accept from his client, while the relation of solicitor and client exists, remuneration for his professional services beyond that to which he is legally entitled.

The vendor of a patent promised a firm of solicitors a commission on the purchase-money of the patent in the event of their finding a purchaser. The solicitors mentioned the matter to one of their clients, who eventually became the purchaser. The client knew that the solicitors were to receive a commission. The commission was paid to the solicitors by the vendor.

Held, that the client could not recover the commission from the solicitors.—HASLAM & HIER EVANS, RE, C.A., 444; 86 L. T. 663.

4. Costs—Taxation—Mortgage—Negotiating fee—General Order under Solicitors' Remuneration Act, 1881, Schedule I., Part I., r. 11—Mortgagees' Legal Costs Act, 1895 (58 & 59 Vict. c. 25), s. 2.—A solicitor lent a client a sum of money on mortgage of real property. Subsequently he sent the client a bill, which included a fee for negotiating the mortgage.

Held, that the solicitor having arranged and obtained the mortgage, he was entitled to the fee. —NORRIS, RE, Ch.D. Swinfen Eady, J., 316; [1902] 1 Ch. 741; 71 L. J. Ch. 187; 86 L. T. 56.

5. Costs—Taxation—Preparing umpire's award—Award taken up by one party to the arbitration and costs of umpire paid—Right of party to an order for taxation in Chancery Division—Solicitors Act, 1843 (6 & 7 Vict. c. 73), ss. 38, 41.—One of the parties to a reference took up the award and paid the amount fixed by the umpire. The amount included the bill of costs of the solicitors employed by the umpire to draw up the award, and it directed that the solicitors' bill of costs should be taxed under section 38 of the Solicitors Act, 1843.

An order for taxation having been obtained in the King's Bench Division to tax the solicitors' bill, the solicitors appealed.

Held, dismissing the appeal, that the umpire being chargeable with the bill and the party who took up the award having paid it, the case came within the words of the Act, and that although the obtaining of the order to tax in the King's Bench Division was irregular, still the judge had jurisdiction to direct taxation. Following, however, the decision in In re Pollard, 36 W. R. 515, 20 Q. B. D. 656, the order must be varied by directing that the taxation should take place in the Chancery Division.—COLLYER-BRISTOW, RE. C.A., 4; [1901] 2 K. B. 839; 70 L. J. K. B. 941; 85 L. T. 208.

6. Lien—"Property recovered or preserved"—Charging order—Priority—Notice of solicitor's right to lien—Purchaser for value without notice—Solicitors Act. 1860 (23 & 24 Vict. c. 127), s. 28.—Property recovered or preserved in an action by a solicitor employed in that action is in the nature of salvage, and he is entitled to be paid for his services on that basis; and he is also entitled to a charge, not only on the property of a particular client, but also, if property of other persons is recovered or preserved in the action, upon their property or interest, for his costs, charges, and expenses, and his charge takes priority over all rights except those of a bonâ fide purchaser for value without notice.

An action was commenced by R. against T. for dissolution of partnership, and a receiver was appointed, and by the action certain of the assets of the partnership were recovered. Whilst the action was proceeding, certain creditors brought actions against the partners, and obtained charging orders or orders following the order made in Kewney v. Attrill, 35 W. R. 191, 34 Ch. D. 345. The solicitor for the plaintiff R. claimed that his charge or lien for costs, charges, and expenses in the action took priority over the charging orders obtained by the creditors.

Held, following Cole v. Eley, 42 W. R. 505, 561, [1894] 2 Q. B. 180, 350, that the creditors, being aware of the existence of the partnership action, must also be taken to have notice of the solicitor's right to a lien on the property recovered, and that consequently they were not purchasers for value without notice, and that the solicitor's lien had priority over the charging orders.

7. Officer of court—Loan of trust money—Jurisdiction—Summary order.—A solicitor's clerk who was trustee under the will of A. lent trust moneys belonging to A.'s estate to his employer, the solicitor, who was aware that the money belonged to the trust. Notice for the payment up of the money was given to the solicitor, but the money was not received. In an action for the administration of A.'s estate,

Held, that the court, in exercise of its jurisdiction over its officers, had power, on motion in the action, to order the solicitor, although he was not a party to the action, to bring the money into court.—CARROLL, RE, BRICE v. CARROLL, *Ch.D. STOCK EXCHANGE:—

1. Broker in default — Liquidation — Completion by jobber with broker's clients—Right of jobber to sue broker for difference.—A broker and member of the Stock Exchange was declared a defaulter, there being then due from him to a firm of jobbers £986. A further sum of £281 became due on the closing at the hammer price. The jobbers completed with the broker's clients and were paid the differences due from them, but by the rules of the Stock Exchange the jobbers had to account for £281 of the amount so received to the official assignee of the Stock Exchange, who was carrying out the liquidation of the broker's estate. The jobbers brought an action against the broker to recover £986 and £281. At the date of trial the liquidation was still proceeding, and the jobbers had paid an interim dividend.

Held, that the action could be maintained, and that the jobbers were entitled to recover the amount claimed, less the amount of the dividend received.—RATCLIFF v. MENDELSSOHN, K.B.D., 106; [1901] 2 K. B. 844; 70 L. J. K B. 969; 85 L. T. 426.

2. Damages—Measure of—Closing account—Breach of contract.—Defendants, who were brokers on the London Stock Exchange, agreed with the plaintiff, for whom they had bought certain shares for a particular settlement, to carry over the shares to the next settlement, and entered into the necessary arrangements with jobbers for that purpose. Before the settlement the defendants, in breach of their agreement, closed the account by selling the shares against him, and gave him notice thereof, the plaintiff insisting upon the defendants performing the contract upon the day fixed for its performance. In an action to recover damages for the breach of contract,

Held, that the plaintiff was not bound to treat the contract as finally determined on the day the account was closed, and to measure his damages upon the prices of the shares ruling on that day, but that he was entitled to have his damages assessed upon the prices ruling on the next settling day, the day fixed for the performance of the contract.

Quære, whether, as held by Wills, J. (ante, p. 154, [1901] 2 K. B. 867), the damages should be assessed upon the highest prices ruling between the date when the account was wrongfully closed and the settling day.—MICHAEL v. HART, C.A., 308; [1902] 1 K. B. 482; 71 L. J. K. B. 265; 86 L. T. 474.

3. Principal and agent—Broker including several orders in one contract—Privity of contract between jobber and broker's customer—Custom.—A broker and member of the Stock Exchange was instructed by the defendant to purchase for him 225 shares in a certain undertaking for the next account. The broker having orders from other customers also to purchase similar shares entered into one contract with the plaintiffs, jobbers on the Stock Exchange, for the purchase of the whole number of shares, 925 in all, and appropriated them in his books to the orders of his various customers. Before the account day the broker was declared a defaulter. The defendant having repudiated the transaction as regards the plaintiffs, they sold 225 of the shares, and, the price having fallen, claimed the difference in an action for breach of contract to buy 225 shares.

Held, that apart from any custom or usage of the Stock Exchange, privity of contract had been created between the plaintiffs and the defendant, and that the defendant was liable to the plaintiffs in damages.—SCOTT v. GODFREY, K.B.D., 61; [1901] 2 K. B. 726; 70 L. J. K. B. 954; 85 L. T. 415.

4. Usage of Stock Exchange—Closing of client's account by broker—Sale and repurchase of shares by broker—Profit made by broker on transaction in fiduciary capacity.—Stockbrokers had on behalf of clients made a contract for the purchase of shares on the Stock Exchange. The clients having failed to provide the money for the price of the shares, the brokers, for the purpose of closing the client's account, went into the market, and sold a like amount of shares to a jobber, and, as part of the same transaction, repurchased the shares from him on their own account. By reason of the sale and repurchase being effected by one transaction, the brokers were enabled to repurchase the shares at a lower price than they would have had to pay if they had purchased them in the market in the ordinary way. The brokers in their account with the clients charged them commission on the sale of the shares to the jobber.

Held, that, the brokers having acted in a fiduciary capacity in the sale of the shares, and having, by reason of that sale and the repurchase being effected as one transaction, obtained a profit for themselves, they were bound to account for that profit to their principals, the clients.—ERSKINE, OXENFORD, & Co. v. SACHS, C.A.; [1901] 2 K. B. 504; 70 L. J. K. B. 978; 85 L. T. 385.

5. Usage of Stock Exchange—Closing of client's account by broker—Sale and repurchase of shares by broker—Validity of closing.—The defendants, who were stockbrokers, by the plaintiff's instructions effected on his behalf contracts on the Stock Exchange for the purchase of shares, upon which they incurred liability to a considerable amount. The plaintiff not providing the defendants with funds to meet that liability, the defendants became entitled to close the account, which they did in respect of the various contracts in the following manner. They got a jobber in the market to make a price for the shares, and, the jobber naming a fair market price, a bargain was made by the defendants with the jobber for the sale of the shares to him at the price fixed and for the repurchase of the shares by them from him for the next account. The plaintiff sued the defendants for wrongfully selling the shares in contravention of an alleged agreement by them to keep the account open. The defendants counterclaimed the difference between the amount of the prices at which the shares were sold to the different jobbers as aforesaid and the amount of the prices at which they were purchased for the plaintiff. The jury at the trial found that the defendants had agreed to keep the account open only on condition that the plaintiff would provide them with money to meet the liability incurred, and that the plaintiff had not done so. Thereupon the judge gave judgment for the defendants for the amount claimed by them on their counterclaim. On application to the Court of Appeal for judgment or a new trial, the plaintiff contended that the closing of the account was not valid, on the ground that the sale of the shares was a mere form, and the defendants, acting in a fiduciary capacity, were not entitled to repurchase the shares on closing the account.

Held, that the defendants were entitled to retain their judgment.

By A. L. Smith, M.R. and Romer, L.J.: There was nothing on the facts to show that the transaction by which the account was closed was otherwise than valid.

By Vaughan Williams and Romer, L.JJ.: Having regard to the manner in which the plaintiff's case had been shaped at the trial, it was not open to him to raise in the Court of Appeal the point that the transaction between the defendants and the jobbers as aforesaid was not a valid mode of closing the account.—MACOUN v. ERSKINE, OXENFORD, & CO., C.A.; [1901] 2 K. STREET:—

Paving — Making up — Landowner — Frontager — Notice to pave — Back roads — Cross roads — Mistake in notice — Blackburn Improvement Act, 1882.—Certain frontagers having failed to comply with a notice under the local Act to pave a street in the borough, the corporation, acting under their powers, themselves paved the street, and in July, 1898, served the frontagers with notice of apportionment of the expenses and demand for payment. The frontagers made default in payment, whereupon the corporation, in February, 1900, commenced an action against them in the Queen's Bench Division for the recovery of the apportioned expenses. The defendants resisted the plaintiffs' claim on the ground that, upon the construction of section 232 of the local Act, the claim was too late, inasmuch as the six months' limitation under section 11 of the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1848, applied to proceedings whether under the summary jurisdiction or otherwise.

Held, that under section 232 the corporation had an option to proceed for the recovery of paving expenses either by complaint before justices under the summary jurisdiction or, alternatively, by action in the superior courts or in any court of competent jurisdiction; that the six months' limitation applied only to a proceeding under the summary jurisdiction, and not to any of the alternative proceedings, and that the action was therefore not out of time.

West Ham Local Board v. Maddams, (1876) 40 J. P. 470; and Tottenham Local Board v. Rowell, (1876) 1 Ex. D. 514, distinguished.

Vestry of Hammersmith v. Lowenfeld, [1896] 2 Q. B. 278, overruled.

The local Act contained separate and distinctive definitions of a "back road" and a "cross road." The corporation served a paving notice under the Act upon frontagers in a back road and two cross roads by reference to a plan deposited for inspection at the office of the borough surveyor, but the notice by mistake described all the three roads upon which the work was to be done as "back roads" only.

Held, affirming Mathew, J., on this point, that the mistake in the description could not have misled the frontagers, and that, therefore, the notice was a good foundation for an action brought by the corporation under the Act for expenses incurred by them in executing the work themselves in the cross roads as well as the back road.—BLACKBURN CORPORATION v. SANDERSON, C.A.; [1902] 1 K. Farwell, J.*, 454.

2. Infringement — Rectification of register — Mark common to the trade — Improper use of words "trade-mark" — Deceptive mark.—In an action by the plaintiffs, a firm of brewers, the owners of two registered trade-marks, each consisting solely of a plain diamond, to restrain the defendants, also a brewing firm, from using in their trade a plain rectilinear ten-sided figure,

Held, that the defendants' device did not so nearly resemble a diamond as to be calculated to deceive, and that the plaintiffs' trade-marks had not been infringed.

Upon motion by the defendants to remove the above marks from the register, and also certain registered labels of the plaintiffs, all of which bore inter alia the device of a diamond with the words trade-mark on the diamond, and all of which, as well as the two above-mentioned, had been registered as old marks,

Held, that all the marks must be removed from the register on the ground (a) that the device of a diamond was at their respective dates of registration common to the trade; and (b) as to the labels, that the words trade-mark being on the diamond alone rendered them deceptive. There is no difference between marks used before 1875 and marks not used before 1875, where they are rendered deceptive by the improper insertion of the words "trade-mark."—BASS, RATCLIFF, & GRETTON (LIMITED) v DAVENPORT & SON'S BREWERY, Ch.D. Kekewich, J.; 86 L. T. 186.

3. Old mark — Invented word — Invented article — "Special and distinctive word" — Word distinctive of manufacturer — Exclusive user — Patented invention — Expiration of patent — Rectification of register — Motion to expunge trade-mark — User before 1875 — Onus of proof — Appeal — Further evidence — Trade-Marks Registration Act, 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 91), s. 10.—In 1877 a chemical manufacturer registered, under the Trade-Marks Registration Act, 1875, the word "Vaseline," which had been invented by him to denote a product of his manufacture, the word being registered as an old mark used by him for six years before 1877.

Upon an application made in 1900 by a rival manufacturer for the removal of the mark from the register,

Held, by Vaughan Williams and Stirling, L JJ., Cozens-Hardy, L.J., dissenting, that the word had been properly registered as a "special and distinctive word" within section 10 of the Act of 1875, since the applicant failed to show that the word had not been used by itself as a trade-mark before the Act, whereas the evidence showed that the word had always been used before and since the passing of the Act to denote, not an article manufactured by a particular process, but an article identified with the name of the particular manufacturer.

Whether, when an inventor invents a new article, and at the same time invents a word to designate it, he can claim the exclusive use of that word to denote his own manufacture, quære.

Where a person is seeking to remove a trademark from the register, the onus is upon him to prove that it ought to be taken off, not upon the party registered to make out his right to retain it on the register; and especially so where the mark has been on the register for many years.

4. Registration—"Distinctive word"—"Addition" to trade-mark—Addition registered as part of trade-mark—"Disentitled to protection"—Disclaimer—Disclaimer subsequent to application for registration Patents, Designs, and Trade-Marks Act, 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. c. 57), ss. 64, 73, 74.—In 1887 the F. Co. registered, in connection with jams, a trade-mark consisting of the word "Silverpan" in large type with their signature underneath, and subsequently the word by itself became identified in the market with their goods. In 1900 the R. Co., rival jam manufacturers, applied that the entire trade-mark might be removed from the register as "being calculated to deceive or otherwise disentitle to protection," within section 73 of the Patents, Designs, and Trade-Marks Act, 1883, or, in the alternative, that the word "Silverpan" might be disclaimed under section 74 as being a "distinctive word."

Held, by the Court of Appeal (reversing Kekewich, J.), that the word "Silverpan" was to be regarded as an "addition" to, and not part of, the trade-mark, and that at the date of registration it was a word "distinctive" of the F. Co.'s goods—that is, "primâ facie distinctive" (Burland v. Broxburn Oil Co., (1889) 42 Ch. D. 274), and, therefore, ought to have been disclaimed under section 74; but, the F. Co. submitting, an order was made to remove the entire trade-mark from the register.

Per Romer, L.J.: "The word 'distinctive' in section 74 means something which, at the time of registration, is chosen by the applicant and is primâ facie suitable, when used, for the purpose of distinguishing his goods from the goods of others."

Where a mark essentially the same as a prior registered mark belonging to the same person has been put on the register, it will not be expunged at the instance of a rival trader.

A trade-mark may consist of several pieces, all of which need not be simultaneously visible.

TRADE NAME:—

1. Injunction—Unauthorized use of name—Holding out as partner—Misrepresentation—Reasonable probability of risk and liability.—A dealer in cycles having advertised his goods in a manner which satisfied the court that he intended the public to believe that the proprietors of the Times newspaper were either the vendors, for whom he acted as manager, or partners or in some way responsibly connected with sale of "Times" cycles.

Held, that an interim injunction ought to be granted restraining the defendant from in any way holding out the Times to be the owners of or connected with his business.—WALTER v. ASHTON, Ch D. Byrne, J.; [1902] 2 Ch. 282.

2. Name of company—Foreign firm—Market in United Kingdom—Registration—Imitation—Signatories to memorandum—Liability—Injunction.—A foreign trader whose goods are in fact imported into England, although he has no English agency, has a sufficient English market to entitle him to an injunction restraining the piracy of his trade name and reputation.

The signatories of a company formed for a fraudulent purpose and duly registered are guilty of a fraudulent conspiracy to effect that purpose, and together with their company can be restrained by injunction.—PANHARD ET LEVASSOR v. PANHARD LEVASSOR MOTOR Co., *Ch.D. 3. Same name—Goods of same class—Misleading the public—Injunction—Form of order.—A person cannot be absolutely restrained from carrying on business in his own name, he can only be restrained from carrying on business in his own name without taking reasonable precautions to prevent his business or goods being confounded with those of another person.—CASH v. CASH, C.A., 289; 86 L. 2. Inducing others to break or not to enter into contract—Coercion—Competition—Trade Union Acts, 1871-76—Lawful disposal of his time and labour—Injury to another without justification.—It is an actionable wrong to induce without justification others to break or refrain from entering into contracts, when this is done for the purpose of injuring another, and damage is thereby caused to him. Legitimate trade competition, the lawful exercise of one's calling, and the lawful use of combination for the advancement of one's trade or labour are not an interference with the rights of others. Outside such opposition, any coercion of another to prevent his disposing of his labour or goods is illegal, and purposely to cause damage to a third person in this manner is likewise an injury for which an action will lie.

TRUSTEE:—

1. Breach of trust—Moneys employed by trustee in trade—Proper rate of interest.—If a trustee invests trust moneys in business with a view to benefiting the trust estate, he must account for the profit made by such investment, or at the option of the cestui que trust he must account for trade interest—i.e., 5 per cent.

2 Business—Administration—Trustees carrying on testator's business—Defaulting trustee—Claim by creditors of the business—Indemnity.—Where a testator's business is carried on after his death by his trustees under a power in the will, the right of the creditors of the business to be paid out of the trust estate in priority to the creditors of the testator, by virtue of the trustees' right of indemnity in respect of the debts properly incurred by them in carrying on the business, is not precluded by the fact that one of the trustees has been found a defaulter—FRITH, RE, NEWTON v. ROLFE, Ch.D. Kekewich, J.; [1902] 1 Ch. 342; 71 L. J. Ch. 199; 86 L. T. 212.

3. Conflicting equities—Fraud of agent—Negligence—Apparent ownership—Estoppel—Conveyancing Act, 1881 (44 & 45 Vict. c. 41) s. 55.—R. transferred the legal title in a bond of the Tyne Commissioners to H., a stockbroker, for the purpose of enabling him to sell the bond on behalf of R. The transfer stated that H. had paid the consideration to R., but no money was in fact paid. H. executed a mortgage of the bond by deed to W. for £1,000, and W. gave notice of his mortgage to the Tyne Commissioners. H. applied the money to his own use and became a bankrupt.

Held, that whether the case was one of general authority, with no limit brought to the notice of W., the mortagees, or was to be regarded as a case of estoppel, R. was not entitled to priority or to a vendor's lien as against W.—RIMMER v. WEBSTER, Ch.D. Farwell, J., 517; [1902] 2 Ch. 163; 71 L. J. Ch. 561; 86 L. T. 491.

4. Executor—Merging of executorship in trusteeship—Statutes of Limitations—Real Property Limitation Act, 1874 (37 & 38 Vict. c. 57)—Trustee Act, 1888, s. 8 (1) (b)—Property retained by the trustee.—Where the executors of the will of a testator who died in 1857, under which part of the property became divisible in 1873 and the remainder in 1892, were also appointed trustees of the will; in an action by a beneficiary for an account,

Held, that the office of executor had merged in that of trustee, and that, therefore, the Trustee Act, 1888, s. 8, applied, and not the Real Property Limitation Act, 1874, s. 8

Held, also, that the exception to section 8 of the Trustee Act, 1888, excluding from the benefit thereof cases in which the proceeds of the trust property are still retained by the trustee, does not apply to cases in which no moral liability attaches to the trustee.—TIMMIS RE, NIXON v. SMITH, Ch.D. Kekewich, J., 164; [1902] 1 Ch. 176; 71 L. J. Ch. 118; 85 L. T. 672.

5. Investment—Excessive advance from trust funds on mortgage security—Honestly and not unreasonably—Relief.—The trustees of a settlement invested the sum of £4,500, forming part of the funds subject to the settlement, by way of mortgage. When the mortgage was taken no actual valuation of the property comprised in the security was made; but the greater part of the property (which was adjacent to the remainder) had been bought at public auction in the previous year by the mortgagor at a rate which would have given to the property comprised in the security the value of £7,167. The true value of the property at the time of the mortgage was, however, £6,394, so that the sum actually advanced by the trustees exceeded the two-thirds value by £237 6s. 8d. The trustees acted under the advice of the solicitors to the trust. In an action against the surviving trustee for the payment of this sum of £237 6s. 8d. and interest thereon, the trustee sought relief under section 3 of the Judicial Trustees Act, 1896. The court found that the trustee had acted honestly and not unreasonably but refused to excuse him altogether; and directed him to make good the sum of £237 6s. 8d., no order being made as to the costs of the action.—WAITE v. PARKINSON, Ch.D. Joyce, J.; 85 L. T. 456.

6. Investment—Improper investments by trustees—Breach of trust—Power to invest on real security in Ireland—Puisne mortgage—Relief under Judicial Trustees Act, 1896 (59 & 60 Vict. c. 35), s. 3.—The trustees of a marriage settlement were thereby directed to invest the trust funds in (among other alternative modes of investment) Government securities of India, or on freehold, copyhold, leasehold, or chattel real securities in England, Wales, or Ireland, and were empowered to vary investments with the consent of the husband and wife during their joint lives. Lands in Ireland, which were already subject to mortgages for £4,700 and £2,460 were further mortgaged for a sum of £17,900, which was by subsequent payments reduced to £12,150. There were three sub-mortgages of the last-mentioned mortgage for the sums of £4,000, £2,153, and £5,000 respectively. The trustees of the marriage settlement, without the consent of the wife, sold out India Stock forming part of the trust funds, and invested the proceeds thereof on a transfer of the third sub-mortgage for £5,000. They took no legal advice as to the propriety of this investment before making it. In an action against the surviving trustee of the settlement for breach of trust,

Held, without deciding whether a puisne mortgage on land in Ireland is of necessity and in all cases an improper investment for trust funds, that an investment of such a nature as the trustees had made in the case before the court was a breach of trust, and that, under the circumstances, the defendant ought not to be relieved from liability in respect thereof under the Judicial Trustees Act, 1896, s. 3.—CHAPMAN v. BROWNE, C.A.; [1902] 1 Ch. 785; 71 L. J. Ch. 465; 86 L. T. 744.

7. Loss to estate—Fraud by solicitor's clerk—Trustees acting reasonably and honestly—Liability of trustee.—A trustee living in the country employed her London solicitors to act as her agents in the trust, the trust account being kept at a London bank. The solicitors kept the cheque and pass books, drawing cheques, and sending them to the trustee for her signature as required. A clerk to the solicitors by fraud obtained the trustee's signature to cheques for £129, inducing her to initial alterations of two of the cheques from order to bearer. He then cashed the cheques and absconded. Upon summons to make the trustee reimburse the £129 to the trust estate.

Held, that under the circumstances the trustee had acted reasonably, and was not liable to make good the loss to the estate.—SMITH, RE, SMITH v. THOMPSON, Ch.D. Kekewich, J.; 71 L. J. Ch. 411; 86 L. T. 401.

8. Purchase from beneficiary by trustee—Fiduciary position — Non-disclosure — Valuation in hands of trustee.—By the law of Scotland, as well as by the law of England, although there is no rule of law that a trustee shall not buy trust property from his cestui que trust, still, if a transaction of that kind is challenged in proper time, a court of equity will examine into it, will ascertain the value that was paid by the trustee, and will throw upon the trustee the onus of proving that he gave full value, and that all information was laid before the cestui que trust when it was sold (following Lord Cairns' opinion in Thomson v. Eastwood, 2 App. Cas. 215, 236).

Where, therefore, a trustee purchased his cestui que trust's share in trust funds, the transaction was set aside on account of the non-disclosure of a valuation which the trustee had previously obtained. —DOUGAN v. MACPHERSON, H.L., 689; [1902] A. C. 197; 71 L. J. P. C. 62; 86 L. T. 361.

9. Shares in company—Proposed reconstruction of company—Exchange of shares in old company for shares in proposed company—Unauthorized investment—Jurisdiction of court to authorize trustees to hold unauthorized investment.—Although as a rule the court has no jurisdiction to sanction the performance by trustees of acts not expressly authorized by the terms of the trust instrument, yet if it is desirable or essential to the interests of all parties that the trustees, in the case of an emergency which may reasonably be supposed not to have been foreseen or anticipated by the author of the trust, should do some act not ordinarily within their powers, then (especially where the trust estate consists of a business or shares in a mercantile company) the court has jurisdiction in a proper case to sanction such acts on behalf of all concerned.—NEW, RE, LANGHAM v. LANGHAM, C.A., 17; [1901] 2 Ch. 534; 70 L. J. Ch. 710; 85 L. T. 174.

10. Settlement—Discharge of one trustee without appointing a substitute—Trustee Act, 1893 (56 & 57 Vict. c. 53), ss. 11, 25.—The court has power, under its inherent jurisdiction in administering the trusts of a settlement, to discharge a trustee, when there are other trustees remaining, without appointing a trustee in the place of the retiring one, but it has not such power under the Trustee Act, 1893.—CHETWYND'S SETTLEMENT, RE, SCARISBRICK v. NEVINSON, Ch.D. Farwell, J., 361; [1902] 1 Ch. 692; 71 L. J. Ch. 352; 86 L. T. 216.

11. Trust for sale—Retirement of trustee—Purchase by him of property subject to trust.—Where a trustee of an instrument containing a power of sale has retired from the trust, he is entitled to purchase property subject to the trust, provided there is nothing to show that at the time of his retirement a sale was contemplated or that he is taking advantage of any information which he might have obtained when he was a trustee.—BOLES AND BRITISH LAND CO.'S CONTRACT, RE, Ch.D. Buckley, J., 185; [1902] 1 Ch. 244; 71 L. J. Ch. 130; 85 L. T. 607.

UNDUE INFLUENCE:—

Solicitor and client — Gift — Bargain — Deeds — Validity—Competent and independent advice.—On the 15th of May, 1900, the plaintiff W. executed two deeds, by the first of which some real estate and other property was settled upon trust for W. for life, and after his death as to part, in trust for his son and daughter, and as to one-tenth of the ultimate residue upon trust for the defendant C., his solicitor. By the second deed certain furniture and chattels were vested in trustees for sale, and out of the proceeds thereof the defendant C. was to receive £500. The deeds were prepared in the office of the defendant C., but were submitted by the plaintiff to A., an independent solicitor.

Held, that the plaintiff under the circumstances did not have the competent and independent advice required, and the deeds were voidable.—WRIGHT v. CARTER, Ch.D. Kekewich, J.; 86 L. T. 110.

VACCINATION:—

1. Neglect to cause child to be vaccinated—Guardians direct their officer not to prosecute—Proceedings nevertheless instituted by him—Visit of public vaccinator at parent's house not a condition precedent—Conviction—Vaccination Act, 1867 (30 & 31 Vict. c. 84), ss. 16, 29, 31—Vaccination Act, 1871 (34 & 35 Vict. c. 98), s. 5—Vaccination Act, 1874 (37 & 38 Vict. c. 75), s. 1—Vaccination Act, 1898 (61 & 62 Vict. c. 49), s. 1.—A vaccination officer is the proper person to institute a prosecution under the Vaccination Acts.

Therefore, where a vaccination officer had prosecuted the appellant under section 29 of the Vaccination Act, 1867, without the consent and contrary to the orders he had received from the guardians, Held, dismissing the appeal, that the prosecution had been rightly instituted.

Held, also, that it is not a condition precedent to such a prosecution for the prosecutor to duly prove that the public vaccinator had visited the home of the child, after notice, as prescribed by section 1, sub-section 3, of the Vaccination Act, 1898, and had offered to vaccinate the child.—MOORE v. KEYTE, K.B.D., 457; [1902] 1 K. B. 768; 71 L. J. K. B. 454; 86 L. T. 532.

2. Order for vaccination of child—Notice—Proceedings under section 29 of the Vaccination Act, 1867 —No further notice—Proceedings under section 31—Child under six months old.—In December, 1900, notice was served on the appellant to have his child vaccinated, and in February, 1901, he was summoned under section 29 of the Vaccination Act, 1867, for neglecting to cause the child to be vaccinated. This summons was dismissed. No further notice was served on the appellant. A summons was then issued under section 31 of the Act, and an order made for the child to be vaccinated. The child was then between the age of six and eighteen months. The public vaccinator had previously visited the appellant's house in accordance with section 1 (3) of the Vaccination Act, 1898, but had failed to serve notice of his intention so to do.

Held, that the order for vaccination was properly made.—BOWDEN v. TOLL, K.B.D., 208; 85 L. T. 486.

VENDOR AND PURCHASER:—

1. Conditions of sale—Stipulation that the "vendor's title is accepted by purchaser"—Leaseholds—Onerous and unusual covenants and provisos—Rescission—Return of deposit with interest.—The fact that a contract for sale contains a clause, "the vendor's title is accepted by the purchaser," does not exempt the vendor from disclosing matters which it is his duty to disclose, and the purchaser will in such case, in the event of non-disclosure, be entitled to rescission and are turn of his deposit with interest.

On a sale of leaseholds it is the duty of the vendor to disclose onerous and unusual covenants in the leases under which the property is held.—HARDICKE AND LIPSKI'S CONTRACT, RE, Ch.D. Byrne, J., 20; [1901] 2 Ch. 666; 70 L. J. Ch. 811; 85 L. T. 402.

2. Conditions of sale—Wilful default—Form of conveyance—Honest mistake—Vendor in possession—Account of rent and profits not on the footing of wilful default—Occupation rent—Losses incurred by vendor in carrying on business.—A vendor who delays the completion of a contract by attempting to insert a clause in the conveyance which he honestly, though erroneously, believes it to be his right to insert is not guilty of wilful default so as to disentitle him to interest on the unpaid balance of the purchase-money.

Where, in an action for specific performance, the decree is simply for an account of rents and profits received by the vendor or for his use while in possession, he will be charged with the rents which he actually received, but not with occupation rent in respect of land which he did not let; and he will be allowed any necessary disbursement in connection with taking over the property from an outgoing tenant, but not losses incurred by him in carrying on a farming business on the property when so taken over.—BENNETT v. STONE, Ch.D. Buckley, J., 118; [1902] 1 Ch. 226; 71 L. J. Ch. 60; 85 L. T. 753.

3. Conveyance — Exception to be ascertained by subsequent election—Limitation of estate to commence in futuro — Invalidity of exception — Conveyance operating at common law—Statute of Uses—Perpetuity.—By a conveyance on sale certain freehold lands were conveyed unto and to the use of the purchaser in fee simple, with the exceptions and reservations set forth in the first schedule to the conveyance. This schedule contained the following words: "Save and except and reserving unto the vendors a piece of land not less than forty feet in width," commencing at a specified point and terminating "at the nearest road to be made by the purchaser or his assigns on the estate so as to give access to such road" from other lands of the vendors. The purchaser afterwards constructed certain roads on the estate. In an action brought to determine whether a plot of land on which a road had been commenced but not completed was excepted from the conveyance,

Held, that the conveyance operated at common law and not under the Statute of Uses, and that the exception was bad; but that even if the conveyance operated under the Statute of Uses it was equally bad as infringing the rule against perpetuities.—SAVILL BROS. (LIMITED) v. BETHELL, C.A., 580; 71 L. J. Ch. 652.

4. Conveyance—Real estate—Conveyance by personal representatives under the Land Transfer Act—Executors appointed for property ouside the jurisdiction—Land Transfer Act, 1897, ss. 1, 2, sub-section 2; s. 24, sub-section 2.—A personal representative in the sense in which the expression is used in the Land Transfer Act, 1897, means a personal representative in whom, prior to the Act, a chattel real belonging to the deceased would have vested.

Executors appointed solely for the foreign property of a testator are not, under the Land Transfer Act, 1897, necessary parties to a conveyance of testator's English real estate.—COHEN'S EXECUTORS AND LONDON COUNTY COUNCIL'S CONTRACT, RE, Ch.D. Byrne, J., 117; [1902] 1 Ch. 187; 71 L. J. Ch. 164; 86 L. T. 73.

5 Covenant for title—Implied covenant—Breach—Measure of damages—Conveyancing Act, 1881 (44 & 45 Vict. c. 41), s. 7.—If a vendor purport to convey land to a purchaser free from a right of way belonging to a third person, which in fact still exists, and is not extinguished, this existence of the right of way is a breach of the covenant for good right to convey implied by the use of the words "as beneficial owner."

The proper measure of damages in such a case is the difference between the purchase price and the value of the land as the vendor had power to convey it.—TURNER v. MOON, Ch.D. Joyce, J., 237; [1901] 2 Ch. 825; 70 L. J. Ch. 822; 85 L. T. 90.

6. Delay—Completion—"Purchaser in default"—Interest—Property sold with possession — Vendor's unreasonable delay—Damages. — The fact that property is sold subject to a condition that the "purchaser in default" shall pay interest on the purchase-money, will not apply where the delay in completion is due to the fault of the vendor. Where the delay in completion is due to the fault of the vendor, the purchaser is entitled to reasonable damages by way of compensation.—JONES v. GARDINER, Ch.D. Byrne, J., 265; [1902] 1 Ch. 191; 71 L. J. Ch. 93; 86 L. T. 74.

7. Deposit—Vendor's lien—Rescission of contract by purchaser under clause in contract—No default by vendor.—The lien that a purchaser of land has on the land for such of the purchase-money as is paid by way of deposit exists so long as, and in every case in which the right to recover the deposit has not been lost by reason of the misconduct of the purchaser. It continues to be operative therefore in a case in which the purchaser himself rescinds the contract under a clause thereof which enables him so to do.

Decision of Farwell, J. (49 W. R. 534. [1901] 1 Ch. 911), affirmed.—WHITBREAD & Co. v. WATT, C.A., 442; [1902] 1 Ch 835; 71 L. J. Ch. 424; 86 L. T. 395.

8. Equitable mortgage—Notice—Forged signature—Legal estate—Title deeds.—A purchaser who had notice of an equitable mortgage on a property, paid the purchase-money for the same upon a receipt for what was due on the equitable mortgage being handed to her solicitors. The purchaser acquired also the legal estate and the title deeds. The signature to the receipt was forged.

Held, in an action brought by the equitable mortgagee, that the equitable mortgage must be enforced against the purchaser. — JARRED v. CLEMENTS, Ch.D. Byrne, J., 611; 86 L. T. 887.

9. Leaseholds — Conditions of sale — Title — Requisition out of time—Imperfect abstract—Outstanding legal estate—Costs.—Property stated to be held on leases was contracted to be sold subject to a condition requiring the purchaser to deliver requisitions and objections on or to the title within fourteen days after receiving his abstract, and in this respect time was to be deemed of the essence of the contract. The abstract showed only an equitable beneficial title in the vendors, and the legal estate was outstanding owing to the non-execution by a company (which had since been dissolved), through whom the vendors made title, of any legal assignment of the leases. Upon the purchaser raising an objection upon this point out of the time prescribed by the condition.

Held, that, as the purchaser got a perfect equitable title and could get the legal estate by application to the Crown, his objection did not so go to the root of the title as to free him from the condition limiting the time for delivery of objections and requisitions, and must therefore be deemed waived, and could not be insisted upon.—PRYCE-JONES v. WILLIAMS, Ch D. Joyce, J., 586.

10. Leaseholds—Contract for sale of lease.—Underlease—Outstanding day—Declaration of trust—By an indenture made in 1865 a lease was granted to J. G. P. for a term of ninety-nine years from the 25th of March, 1865, at a rent of £3 16s. 4d. The lease became vested in H., who on the 6th of August, 1885, granted S. H. an underlease for the whole of the term, less eleven days, at a rent of £12. H. then mortgaged for the whole term, less one day, of which there was a declaration of trust, and on the 29th of September, 1896, the mortgagees sold to W. S. The vendors were the legal personal representatives of W. S., and the purchaser had entered into a contract to buy what was described in the particulars as "an improved leasehold ground-rent of £8 3s. 8d. arising out of a ground-rent of £12 amply secured on property held on lease . . . having fifty-three years unexpired in March, and subject to an original ground-rent of £3 16s. 4d." The conditions provided that the title should commence with an indenture of underlease dated the 6th of August, 1885, and that the purchaser should not question the validity of the underlease, but should assume a good title was vested in W. S. for the residue of the term. The purchaser contended that he was entitled to an assignment of the original lease, and that, as there was an outstanding day, he was entitled to a declaration that the vendor had not made out a good title, and to the return of his deposit. The vendor said that he had only contracted to sell the term for which the ground-rent of £12 was payable. The purchaser, moreover, had delivered no requisitions, and it was submitted that the objection was out of time

Held, (1) that the objection was not out of time, as the objection was one of conveyance and not of title; (2) that what was contracted to be sold was the improved ground-rent for the whole term during which it was payable.

Semble, even if the contract had been to assign the whole of the original term, the vendor could have enforced the contract, as there was a declaration of trust of the last day of the term.—SCOTT AND EAVE'S CONTRACT, RE, Ch.D. Swinfen Eady, J.; 86 L. T. 617.

11. Misdescription — Land sold for building purposes—Underground culvert for water unknown to both parties.—A builder and contractor entered into a contract with the trustees of a will for the purchase of a property described as possessing an important frontage with a valuable prospective building element. A condition in the contract provided that, the property being open for inspection, the purchaser should be deemed to buy with full knowledge of its actual quantities and condition, and that any error in the particulars should not annul the sale nor be the subject of compensation. The purchaser inspected the property but did not discover then or till after the completion of the contract that there was a culvert for the passage of water under it, the existence of which was not shown on the plans, and was in fact unknown to the vendors.

Held, on the evidence, that the purchaser could not have discovered it by any reasonable care, and that in view of the fact that the land was sold to the knowledge of both parties for building purposes, the existence of the culvert involved such a misdescription affecting the subject-matter of the contract in a material and substantial point as to bring the case within the rule laid down in Flight v. Booth, 1 Bing. N. C. 370, and that a good title had not been shown.

12. Open contract—Leasehold—Covenant to repair broken—Dangerous structure—London Building Acts. 1894 and 1898 (57 & 58 Vict. c. 213; 61 & 62 Vict. c. 137)—Conveyancing Act, 1881 (44 & 45 Vict. c. 41), s. 3, sub-section 4.—A leasehold house was sold in July, 1901, under an open contract, the lease containing a covenant to keep the building in good and substantial repair and condition. On the 1st of November, 1901, a police-court order was made under the London Building Acts, 1894 and 1898, requiring the vendor to underpin a portion of the house within fourteen days. On the 6th of November, 1901, the vendor established a good title to the premises.

Held, that the expense of complying with the police-court order for the repair of the premises in respect of which the vendor was liable under the covenant in the lease, must be borne by the vendor, and could not be thrown by him upon the purchaser.

13. Possession of tenant—Notice of lessor's title—Reasonable inquiry—Conveyancing Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 39), s. 3.—Possession of land by a tenant affects a purchaser with knowledge only of the tenant's rights, and not with knowledge of the lessor's title.

An inquiry of the tenant to whom the rent is paid is not an inquiry which ought reasonably to be made by a purchaser, so that, by reason of his omission to make such inquiry, he is not affected either by virtue of section 3 of the Conveyancing Act, 1882, or of the law as it stood before the passing of that Act, with constructive notice of anything he might have learned if such inquiry had been made.

14. Railway company — Mine owner — Possession of mines—Interest upon purchase-money—Construction of private Act of Parliament—"Losses."—A railway company, owners of a canal, were empowered by a private Act of Parliament to give notice to adjacent mine owners not to work their mines within a prescribed distance of the canal. Upon such a notice being given the company were to purchase the mines affected by the notice, the amount of purchase-money and compensation was to be settled by arbitration, and the compensation was to include "all such additional expenses and losses" as should be incurred by the mine owner by the minerals being left for the support of the canal. In 1892 the company gave a notice under the Act to a mine owner. The amount of the purchase-money and compensation was settled by arbitration in 1901, and was subsequently paid by the company without prejudice to the question of the right of the mine owner to interest.

Held, that the mine owner was not entitled to interest under the Act as an "additional loss."

But, held, that the company were in possession or enjoyment of the mines in question from the date of their notice, and that upon the general principles of equity as between vendor and purchaser the mine owner was entitled to interest at 4 per cent. upon the purchase-money as from that date.—FLETCHER v. LANCASHIRE AND YORKSHIRE RAILWAY CO., Ch.D. Buckley, J., 423; [1902] 1 Ch. 901; 71 L. J. Ch. 590.

15. Specific performance—Mistake—Bidding for different property—Hardship—Damages.—A purchaser of freehold property at a public auction who has made a mistake, in no way induced by the vendor, in bidding for and becoming the purchaser of a different property from that which he came to buy, will not be relieved from specific performance of the contract upon the ground of such blunder where no hardship amounting to injustice is thereby inflicted upon him.—VAN PRAAGH v. EVERIDGE, *Ch.D. 16. Title—Trust for sale—Leaseholds—Trustees assignees—Sale by sub-demise—Vendor and Purchaser Act, 1874 (37 & 38 Vict. c. 78), s. 9.—It is not a proper exercise of their powers for trustees who hold leasehold property on trust for sale to sell it by way of sub-demise, as by so doing they do not get rid of the liability attaching to the lease.—WALKER AND OAKSHOTT'S CONTRACT, RE, *Ch.D. 17. Will—Construction—Trust for sale—Election—Purchase by trustee for sale.—On a contract for sale of leaseholds the purchaser objected that the vendor at the time when he bought the property was himself a trustee.

Held, on the facts, that if an appropriation had taken place it was not effectual to destroy the trust for sale; that, until the testator's son was found lunatic, there could be no election by the beneficiaries; but there had been no election to take in specie by the court on behalf of the lunatic; that the trust for sale had not come to an end at the time of the purchase by the trustee; and that the title ought not to be forced on the purchaser.—DOUGLAS AND POWELL, RE, *Ch.D. WATER:—

1. Canal—Right to support—Working of subjacent and adjacent minerals—Compensation for minerals left unworked.—By the Act 30 Geo. 3, c. 82, the plaintiffs were incorporated as a company for carrying on a navigable canal; and it was enacted that they should for that purpose have power to purchase lands and to enter upon the lands of any person or persons, and to construct and do all other matters which the company should think necessary and convenient for making and using the canal and other works, the company doing as little damage as might be in the execution of the several powers thereby granted, and making satisfaction in manner hereinafter mentioned for all damages to be sustained by the owners of and persons interested in such lands as should be taken, used, or prejudiced in or by the execution of the Act, provided, nevertheless, that nothing in the Act should entitle the company, on purchasing any lands for making the canal or for any other the purposes aforesaid, to any mines of coal, ironstone, or other minerals which should be found in cutting or making the canal and other works aforesaid or that should be under the same, but that all such mines should appertain and belong to such person or persons as would have been entitled to the same in case the Act had not been made. The plaintiffs duly acquired the lands necessary, and constructed and completed the canal and works under the powers of the Act. The purchase-money and compensation properly payable upon taking the lands were duly ascertained, and there had been no default in payment. The defendants were the owners of a colliery which they were working, and the land under which their mines were situate was traversed for a considerable distance by the canal. The defendants, in the ordinary course of working their mines, were desirous of working the coal subjacent or adjacent to the canal.

Held, that the defendants were entitled to get so much of the coal as they could get without injuring the proper support of the canal and works; but that they were not entitled to get the coal to the injury of that support; and that the whole compensation having been assessed at once at the time of the purchase by the plaintiffs, the defendants could not now be entitled to compensation for that in respect of which they had already been compensated.—GLAMORGANSHIRE CANAL NAVIGATION CO. v. NIXON'S NAVIGATION CO., C.A.; 85 L. T. 53.

2. Canal—Waste water—Wrongful abstraction of water.—By a private Act of Parliament it was provided that all the "waste water" of the appellants' canal, with certain immaterial exceptions therein mentioned, should be discharged into another canal, which had since become the property of the respondents. The appellants had for many years supplied water from their canal to various manufacturing works situated near the canal.

Held, that as the appellants were a canal company, not a waterworks company, "waste water" meant all water not legitimately needed for the purposes of navigation, and that they might be restrained from so disposing of their water as to prevent it from passing into the respondent's canal. —ROCHDALE CANAL CO. v. MANCHESTER SHIP CANAL, H.L.; 85 L. T. 585.

3. River—Navigable non-tidal river—Public right of navigation—Power to levy tolls—Royal charter—Validity—Construction—Permissive statutory powers—Implied obligation to maintain and repair—6 Geo. 1, c. 29—Practice—Powers of Court of Appeal—Variation of judgment in favour of respondent giving no cross-notice of appeal—Rules of Supreme Court, 1883, ord. 58, r. 4.—A royal charter ought, if possible, to be so construed that it shall not exceed the powers of the Crown.

The judgment at the trial of the action declared that the public were entitled to pass through the locks without paying any toll, and through the stanch on payment of the statutory toll, and that the defendant was not liable to maintain or work any of the locks or the stanch. The defendant appealed from the judgment, other than the latter part of the declaration. The plaintiffs gave no cross-notice of appeal.

Held, that the Court of Appeal, while allowing the appeal to the extent of declaring that the defendant was entitled to a reasonable toll for passage of boats through the locks, had power also, under ord. 58, r. 4, to vary the judgment in favour of the plaintiffs by declaring that the defendant was bound to maintain and work both the locks and the stanch, and the judgment was varied accordingly.—ATTORNEY-GENERAL v. SIMPSON, C.A.; [1901] 2 Ch. 671; 70 L. J. Ch. 828; 85 L. T. 325.

4. Supply of water—Domestic purposes—Boarding-house—Trade or business.—The private Act of a water company provided that the owner or occupier of any house in any street in which any pipe of the company should be laid should be entitled to demand a supply of filtered water for domestic purposes, and that the company should supply such water at certain rates not exceeding the rates specified in the Act; and it was further provided that a supply of water for domestic purposes should not include, inter alia, a supply of water for "any trade manufacture or business whatsoever," and that water for purposes other than domestic purposes might be supplied by agreement between the consumer and the water company. A boarding-house keeper claimed a supply of filtered water for domestic purposes, and tendered rates for the same calculated upon the annual value of his house, which contained ordinary sitting-rooms, ten bedrooms, two water-closets, but no fixed bath, and was inhabited by himself, his family, and boarders, who all used the water.

Held, that where water supplied to the boarding-house was in fact used for domestic purposes only, and not for the purposes of a trade or business, the water company could not under their Act claim to supply it by agreement.—PIDGEON v. GREAT YARMOUTH WATERWORKS CO., K B.D.; [1902] 1 K. B. 310; 17 L. J. K. B. 61; 85 L. T. 632.

5. Thames Conservators—Upper Thames—Dredging licences—Sale of proceeds—Licensee's own profit—Riparian owner.—The Conservators of the River Thames are not empowered by the Thames Conservancy Act, 1894, to grant dredging licences for the Upper Thames to their agents, servants, or workmen, authorizing them to dredge, and also to sell the proceeds of the dredging for their own personal profit.—PALMER v. THAMES CONSERVATORS, Ch.D. Kekewich, J.; [1902] 1 Ch. 163; 71 L. J. Ch. 212; 85 L. T. 537.

6. Watercourse — Artificial stream — Rights of riparian proprietors.—In determining the rights of riparian proprietors in an artificial watercourse the court will take into consideration, first, the character of the watercourse, whether it is of a temporary or permanent character; secondly, the circumstances under which it was created; thirdly, the methods of user.

The plaintiffs were owners of a mill on an artificial watercourse which had been in existence for more than 400 years. They had the right to regulate the flow of water into the channel, and the burden was cast upon them of keeping the channel clean and unincumbered. The evidence showed that in ancient times there had been another mill on the same channel, and that its water had also been used for the purposes of a tannery, on the site of which the defendants had erected a factory.

Held, that, on the evidence, it could not be inferred that the artificial watercourse in question had been created upon the conditions that the plaintiffs should be entitled to every drop of water flowing through it. Consequently the defendants were entitled to the ordinary rights of riparian owners, and could use the water for any purposes they desired so long as such user inflicted no sensible injury on the plaintiffs.—BAILEY & CO. v. CLARK, SON, & MORLAND (LIMITED), C.A., 511; [1902] 1 Ch. 649; 71 L. J. Ch. 396; 86 L. T. 309.

7. Watercourse—Inclosure award—Jurisdiction of commissioner—Repairing and cleansing—Highway authority — Inclosure Act (52 Geo. 3, c. xiii.). —An Inclosure Act provided that the commissioner should set out such watercourses as he should think proper, and should order and direct by whom and at whose expense such watercourses should be repaired and cleansed. The Act further provided that the commissioner should assign land for the getting of materials for repairing public roads. The commissioner, in pursuance of such Act, by his award appointed certain roads to be set out, and awarded to the surveyor of highways land for the getting of materials for the repair of public roads. He further ordered that a watercourse should be made, and directed that such watercourse should for ever thereafter be repaired and cleansed by the surveyor of highways for the time being, the expenses attendant upon such repairing and cleansing to be paid out of a rate to be made for the repair of highways in the township.

Held, that it was within the jurisdiction of the commissioner to order the surveyor of highways to repair and cleanse the watercourse and to raise the expenses of so doing by means of a rate.—ATTORNEY-GENERAL v. TAMWORTH DISTRICT COUNCIL, Ch.D. Byrne, J.; 85 L. T. 190.

WILD BIRDS:—

Exposing for sale—"Recently taken."—A wild bird is not of necessity not recently taken because it has been in the possession of a person for a period of three weeks. The offence of exposing for sale, or having possession of any wild bird recently taken, is dependent upon section 3 of the Wild Birds Protection Act, 1880, as amended by the Act of 1881, and it is incumbent upon the prosecution to show that the birds were wild birds and have been recently taken.—GREEN v. CARSTANG, K.B.D.; 85 L. WILL:—

1. Administration with will annexed—Gift to charity—Residuary legatee—Court of Probate Act, 1857, s. 73.—A testator, a Roman Catholic canon, bequeathed a legacy to the then Roman Catholic bishop of his diocese—by name—for the benefit of the library of a certain educational institution, the legal ownership and custody of which was vested in the said bishop ex officio. He also appointed the said bishop his residuary legatee, and bequeathed the residue of his estate, subject to a certain legacy, to the said bishop—again by name—for the same objects as above. The testator survived the execution of his will about eleven years, during which time there had been three successors to the said bishop, but the ownership, &c., of the institution was still vested in the bishop for the time being ex officio. The court granted administration with the will annexed to the bishop for the time being, under section 73 of the Court of Probate Act, 1857, but without prejudice to any rights of the next-of-kin.—LALOR, IN THE GOODS OF, P.D. & Ad.D.; 71 L. J. P. 17; 85 L. T. 643.

2. Annuity—Arrears—Interest—Administration action—Certificate.—Arrears of an annuity given by a will do not as a rule carry interest. It is not the the practice to certify the arrears of an annuity from any particular date.—HISCOE, RE, HISCOE v. WAITE, Ch.D. Kekewich, J.; 71 L. J. Ch. 347.

3. Bequest of sum "sufficient to pay and discharge all estate duty"—Claim of limited owner to charge settled estates in respect of estate duty—Finance Act, 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. c. 30), ss. 8 (4), 9 (1) (6).—A testator, by a codicil to his will executed after the passing of the Finance Act, 1894, bequeathed to his eldest son, to whom entailed estates would pass on the testator's death, a sum of money "sufficient to pay and discharge all estate duty" which might be payable by him.

The residuary legatee claimed that the legacy was impressed with a trust to pay the estate duty, and that the legatee consequently lost his right to recoup himself by a charge on the settled estates under section 9 (6) of the Act, the object of the gift being to discharge the estate duty, and so to free the settled estates from liability. The legatee, on the other hand, claimed that the legacy was one for his own benefit, being a gift to him measured by the amount which he would have to pay for estate duty.

Held (dissentiente Stirling, L.J.), that, there being no words indicative of a desire on the part of the testator to give the legatee absolute property, the inference could not be drawn that he should take the legacy unfettered by any purpose of the testator; and that this was not a legacy with a motive added, but an imperative direction, the purpose here, as distinguished from a motive, being the discharge of the estate duty.—MEXBOROUGH, RE, SAVILE v. MEXBOROUGH, C.A.; 86 L. T. 331.

4. *Charitable legacy—Charity which has never existed—General charitable intention—Cy-près—Class of residuary legatees.*—In the case of a legacy to a charity which has never existed, the court will lean towards finding in the will indications of a general charitable intention. Such indications are furnished by (1) the interpolation of the legacy in question amongst other charitable legacies; (2) a power to the executors to determine questions as to what charities are intended to be benefited; and (3) a bequest of residue to the charitable institutions mentioned. The legacy, consequently, does not lapse, but is administered cy-près. The institution or authority which administers the legacy cy-près is included in the words "charitable institutions which are beneficiaries under this instrument," and, consequently, takes a share of a residuary bequest to such institutions.—DAVIS, RE, HANNEN v. HILLYER, Ch.D. Buckley, J., 378; [1902] 1 Ch. 876; 71 L. J. Ch. 459; 86 L. T. 292.

5. Charity—"Such charitable or public purposes as my trustee thinks proper"—Uncertainty.—A testatrix bequeathed half her residue to be "applied for such charitable or public purposes as my trustee thinks proper."

Held, that such bequest was void for uncertainty.

Decision of the Court of Session in Scotland (3 Ct. Sess. Cas. 5th Ser. 274, 38 Scot. L. R. 209) affirmed.—BLAIR v DUNCAN, H.L., 369; [1902] A. C. 37; 71 L. J. P. C. 22; 86 L. T. 157.

6. Condition—Name—Devise of real estate—Condition that devisee should take and use testator's name—Preceding life estate—Lunacy and death of devisee during life of tenant for life—Non-performance of condition—Condition precedent or subsequent—Remainder in fee—Vesting.—Testator by his will, dated in 1853, devised his real estate to his daughter for life, and after her death for her children; and if she should have no child the testator devised his real estate to N., on condition that he should take and use the testator's name only. The testator died in 1853. His daughter, who was now in her fifty-ninth year, was married, but had had no issue. N. died in 1855 without having taken the testator's name. For eighteen months previous to his death he had suffered from insanity, and for six months previous to his death had been in an asylum.

Held, that whether the condition were precedent or subsequent, its performance had not been rendered impossible by the act of God; and that N. having failed to perform it, the devise to him could not take effect.—GREENWOOD, RE, GOODHART v. WOODHEAD, Ch.D. Joyce, J.; [1902] 2 Ch. 198; 71 L. J. Ch. 579; 86 L. T. 500.

7. Construction—Ambiguity—Administration of assets—Extrinsic evidence.—A testator, after bequeathing a number of general legacies, gave and bequeathed "all the residue and remainder" of two specific mortgage funds, after payment of his just debts and funeral and testamentary expenses, to certain persons therein mentioned. There was no general residuary bequest.

The testator possessed at the date of his will no residuary property out of which to provide the general pecuniary legacies, but at his death he had obtained more than sufficient for the purpose.

Held, that the general pecuniary legacies were payable out of the residue in exoneration of the two specifically bequeathed mortgaged debts, which were only subject to the debts and funeral and testamentary expenses, and that there was no ambiguity in the will to admit extrinsic evidence.

8. Construction—Bequest—Compound designation—Inaccurate description—Validity.—Where the description of a legatee is made up of more than one part, and one part is true but the other false, if the part which is true describes the subject or object of the gift with sufficient certainty, the untrue part will be rejected and will not vitiate the gift. Thus the description of a legatee as "L., the wife of my son F.," is sufficient to pass the gift to L., although she was not in fact the lawful wife of F., although the testator believed that she was.—ANDERSON v. BERKLEY, Ch.D. Joyce J., 684.

9. Construction—Bequest—"Furniture and other personal effects"—Tenant's fixtures—Trade or business—Articles—Hotel.—A testator bequeathed to A. "all the furniture and other personal effects belonging to me, and which at the date of my death are at the R. Hotel." The testator resided at and carried on the hotel, of which he was yearly tenant.

Held, that all the effects at the hotel belonging to the testator, whether used in connection with the hotel business or not, passed under the bequest, but that tenant's fixtures did not pass.—SETON SMITH, RE, BURNAND v. WAITE, Ch.D. Buckley, J., 456; [1902] 1 Ch. 717; 71 L. J. Ch. 386; 86 L. T. 322.

10. Construction—Chattels settled to go with dignity—So far as the rules of law and equity permit—Absolute vesting.—A testatrix by her will bequeathed certain jewels to her son, the third Viscount H., for life, and after his death "to each and every of the persons who shall in turn succeed to the title and dignity of Viscount H. . . . severally and successively as they shall in turn succeed to such title and dignity as aforesaid, my intention being that the said jewels shall descend as heirlooms as far as the rules of law and equity will permit."

Held, that the jewels vested absolutely in the first person who succeeded to the title on the death of the third viscount.

11. Construction—Devise of "all my real estate"—Outstanding interests—Wills Act, 1837 (1 Vict. c. 26), s. 26.—A. was owner in fee, subject to a lease of ninety-nine years, of certain property. A. also held a sub-lease of the same property for a term less by two days than the original lease. By his will he devised his real estate to B. and his leasehold estate to his executors.

Held, that the devise by A. of "all his real estate" passed all A.'s interest in the property which was his freehold, including his interest in the sub-lease.—GUYTON AND ROSENBERG'S CONTRACT, RE, Ch.D. Cozens-Hardy, J., 38; [1901] 2 Ch. 591; 70 L. J. Ch. 751; 85 L. T. 66.

12. Construction—Direction to pay "estate duty" out of residue—Settlement estate duty.—A direction in a will to pay estate duty out of a particular fund will be taken to refer to settlement estate duty as well, unless a contrary intention is shown to exist.—LEVERIDGE, RE, SPAIN v. LEJOINDRE, Ch.D. Joyce, J., 205; [1901] 2 Ch. 830; 71 L. J. Ch. 23; 85 L. T. 458.

13. Construction—Estate for life to eldest son—Remainder to grandchildren—Gift over to heir-at-law.—The testator devised his freehold estate called F. G. to trustees upon trust for his eldest son for life; and, after making directions as to the disposal of his personal estate among his six children, concluded his will thus: "When my six children shall have all departed this life it is my will and desire that the said estate called F. G. be sold in public sale to the highest bidder, and that the moneys arising from the sale thereof be equally divided among my then surviving grandchildren share and share alike, and in case no grandchild of mine be then living it shall become the property of the heir-at-law."

Held, that the heir-at-law must be construed as meaning the heir of the testator at his death, and not the person who would have been the heir of the testator if he had died at the death of the last of his children.—FRITH, RE, HINDSON v. WOOD, Ch.D. Joyce, J.; 85 L. T. 455.

14. Construction—Estate in special tail—Issue—Gift to A. if he marries a gentlewoman and has issue male, to such issue male and their male descendants.—A testator willed and bequeathed certain estates to his son Charles. Then after providing that another son might redeem those estates, he continued: "The proceeds to go with the limitations of this will—that is to say, to my son Charles if he marries a fit and worthy gentlewoman and has issue male, to such issue male and their male descendants, in failure of which," then over.

Held, that Charles took an estate in tail male special.

15. Construction — Foreign law — Next-of-kin — Whole and half blood—Next-of-kin of a German subject.—The expression next-of-kin means, in English law, the nearest blood relations in an ascending and descending line, whether of the whole or half blood, and this construction will be placed on that expression in the will of an English testator giving a legacy to the next-of-kin of a legatee who is a subject of a foreign state, under the law of which relations of the half blood are not deemed next-of-kin.—FERGUSSON'S TRUST, RE, Ch.D. Byrne, J., 312; [1902] 1 Ch. 483; 71 L. J. Ch. 360.

16. Construction — Gift of income of residue to children for life subject to annuity to widow — Death of widow — Advances — Hotchpot — Interest on advances. — A testator by his will and codicil, dated the 5th of May, 1880, and the 12th of July, 1882, respectively, after giving certain legacies, devised and bequeathed his residuary estate to trustees upon trust to pay out of the income thereof the annual sum of £2,000 to his widow during her life, and, subject thereto, to divide the residuary estate into as many shares as there should be children living at his death, and to pay the annual income of such shares to his children; and then upon trusts therein expressed. The testator provided that, as to certain advances already made to some of his children, and as to any future advances to his children exceeding at any one time the sum of £1,000, these advances should be treated as capital of the original shares, and be brought into hotchpot and accounted for accordingly. The testator died on the 3rd of July, 1887, and left surviving him six children, of whom three had received advances, and three had not. The widow died in March, 1900.

Held, that, in bringing the advances into hotchpot for the purposes of determining the respective shares of the six children, the shares of the advanced children must respectively be debited with 4 per cent. on the amount of their respective advances from the testator's death down to the time when the estate ought, or should be deemed, to have been divided. — HARGREAVES, RE, HARGREAVES v. HARGREAVES, Ch.D. Joyce, J.; 86 L. T. 43.

17. Construction—Gift of income to two persons "so that each shall receive half during their lives"—Gift over—Death of one person—Implied gift to the other.—By his will a testator gave the income of his residuary estate to E. W. G. and H. H. G. "in equal parts—that is to say, that they shall each receive the half amount of the interest during their natural lives." After "their deaths" the income was given over to other persons.

Held, that on the death of E. W. G., H. H. G. took by implication the income of the whole fund during her life.—TELFAIR, RE, GARRIOCH v. BARCLAY, Ch.D. Farwell, J.; 86 L. T. 496.

18. Construction—Gift to class—Gift of residue to members of a class living at period of distribution—Direction for settlement of "the share" of any one of the class—Death of legatee before period of distribution.—A testatrix, who died in 1854, by her will, made in 1849, directed the income of her residuary estate to be paid to her sisters S. and C., in equal shares, during their joint lives, or until one of them should marry or die, and after the death or marriage of either, then to the other, during her life, or until she should marry, and after the death or marriage of such surviving or last marrying sister the testatrix directed that, subject to trusts which she declared of a sum of £1,000, her residuary estate should be held in trust for all or such one or more of her brothers and sisters (except her sister E., but including S. and C., if they or either of them should marry) who should be living at the death or marriage of such surviving or last marrying sister, in equal shares, if more than one, as tenants in common. And (after providing for the event of her brothers, or either of them, being dead, or either of her sisters S. and C., having previously married, being dead at the death or marriage of such her surviving or last marrying sister) the testatrix directed that with respect to "the share" of her sister H. "the same share" should be held in trust to pay the income thereof to her during her life, for her separate use, and after her death the capital of "the same share" should be held in trust for her child or her children, as she should by deed or will appoint, and in default of appointment in trust for and to vest in her child or all her children, if more than one, being sons at twenty-one, and being daughters at twenty-one or marriage, and if more than one in equal shares.

At the date of the will the testatrix had living three brothers and four sisters, two of whom, S. and C., were unmarried, and the other two, E. and H., were married. S. and C. never married. C. died in 1900, having survived all her brothers and sisters. H. died in 1884. She had had four children, all of whom attained twenty-one; but they all died before C. Neither the brothers nor the sister E. left issue.

Held, that by the expression "the share" of H. was meant an aliquot part of the estate of the testatrix, and not merely the share which H. would have taken if she had survived her sister C., and that, consequently, the representatives of the deceased children of H. were entitled to the residue.—WHITMORE, RE, WALTERS v. HARRISON, C.A.; [1902] 2 Ch. 66.

19. Construction—Gift to class—Gift to A. and B. and the children of C.—Gift divisible into thirds—No class gift.—By his will dated the 7th of June, 1870, a testator bequeathed his residuary personal estate to trustees upon trust for sale and conversion, and upon certain trusts for the benefit of his daughter for life, and for her issue (all of which trusts failed), and the will then continued as follows: "And in case there shall be no child of my said daughter who being male shall attain the age of twenty-one years, or being female shall attain that age or marry, then I direct and declare that my said trustees or trustee shall stand possessed of the said residuary trust fund in trust for the said George Barker, his sister, Mary Barker, and the children now living of the said Richard Hollings who being male shall live to attain the age of twenty-one years, or being females shall live to attain that age or marry, and if more than one in equal shares, the share or shares of any of them being female to be for her or their sole and separate use." The testator died on the 26th of June, 1870. There were four children of Richard Hollings living at the date of the death of the testator, all of whom attained the age of twenty-one years.

Held (dissentiente Stirling, L.J.), that the intention of the testator was that the investments representing the residuary trust fund should be divided into equal thirds (one of such thirds being again divisible into fourths) between George Barker, Mary Barker, and the children of Richard Hollings; that those persons did not constitute a class, they not being united or connected by any common tie; and that the gift was therefore not a class gift.

Blackler v. Webb, 2 P. Wms. 383, considered.—CAPES v. DALTON, C.A.; 86 L. T. 129.

20. Construction—Gift to a class—Gift over on death "leaving issue"—Period of indefeasible vesting.—In a gift to a class with a gift over of the shares of any members of it who die "leaving issue," the members of the class take vested indefeasible interests only if and when they die leaving issue, unless there be some context limiting and defining the natural and proper meaning of the words, which is, death at any time.

Decision of Joyce, J., [1901] 2 Ch. 338, 49 W. R. Dig. 198, affirmed.—SCHNADHORST, RE, SANDKUHL v. SCHNADHORST, C.A., 485; [1902] 2 Ch. 234; 71 L. J. Ch. 454, 86 L. T. 426.

21. Construction—Gift to illegitimate children—Gift to children by name—Gift to next-of-kin of children.—A testator, after bequeathing legacies to each of his seven children by name, gave the residue of his estate to his said seven children in equal shares, the shares of each daughter to be settled as therein mentioned, with an ultimate trust in the event of a daughter dying without issue "for the persons who at the death of such daughter would have become entitled to such share under the statutes for the distribution of the personal estates of estates." Three of the children named in the will were born before marriage. One of these, a daughter, died without issue.

Held, that the testator having by his will shown an intention that all his children should be treated as legitimate and akin to one another, the persons who were to take under the statute were to be ascertained also on that footing. Consequently the deceased daughter's share devolved upon those persons who at the time of her death would have been her next-of-kin according to the statute if she and all the other children named in the will had been legitimate.

Decision of Kekewich, J. (ante, p. 102), reversed. —WOOD, RE, WOOD v. WOOD, C.A., 695.

22 Construction—Gift to widow—Gift over of balance, "if any," of money.—A testator bequeathed the residue of his estate to his wife for her sole use and benefit so long as she should remain his widow. In the event of her re-marriage he directed that the balance, if any, of money and farm stock left, not to exceed £400, should be divided between his brothers and sisters.

Held, that the widow took absolutely except as to a sum of £400, which went over upon her marrying again, in the event of there being a balance of unexpended residue to that amount on the day of her second marriage.—ROWLAND, RE, JONES v. ROWLAND, Ch.D. Swinfen Eady, J.; 86 L. T. 78.

23. Construction—Gift over in default of issue—Surviving brothers and sisters—Children of deceased brother.—A testator by his will devised and bequeathed his property in seven shares to his seven children for life, with remainder to each child's children or child. The share of any child dying without children was to go to his then surviving brothers and sisters as tenants in common for their respective lives, with remainder to their respective children, and if there should be but one surviving brother or sister, then to him or her absolutely. If any child left no child him surviving, but left grandchildren, the grandchildren were to take such child's share. In default of grandchildren, such child's share was to go to his then surviving brothers and sisters as tenants in common, and if there was but one to that one absolutely.

Held, that the word "surviving" was to be taken in its natural meaning, and that the children of a deceased child of the testator were not entitled to participate along with the surviving children of the testator in the share of a child of the testator who had survived their father and died without issue.

Per Romer, L.J.—The decision of Cozens-Hardy, J., in Harrison v. Harrison (49 W. R. 613, [1901] 2 Ch. 136), dissenting from the third rule in In re Bowman (37 W. R. 583, 41 Ch. D 525), approved.—INDERWICK v. TATCHELL, C.A., 100; [1901] 2 Ch. 738; 71 L. J. Ch. 1; 85 L. T. 432.

24. Construction—"Money"—"The rest of my money"—Other property—Residue.—The meaning to be attached to the word "money" in construing a testamentary document is not absolute and technical, but must depend upon the context and surrounding circumstances.

Where a testator, by his will, left a specific legacy to his brother, and gave "the rest of my money" among six other persons, whom he named.

Held, that the latter bequest covered all the residue of his estate.—BRAMLEY, IN THE GOODS OF, P.D. & Ad.D.; [1902] P. 106; 71 L. J. P. 32; 85 L. T. 645.

25. Construction—"My personal estate," &c.—Devise of real estate.—A testator after giving and bequeathing his real estates and all his presonal estate and effects to his wife for her life, after her death gave to certain relatives "an equal share of my personal estates, &c."

Held, that the gift after the death of the wife included the real estate of the testator.—ANDREW'S ESTATE, RE, CREASEY v. GRAVES, Ch.D. Buckley, J., 471.

26. Construction—Legacies given by will free of duty—Additional legacies by codicil, including one to a legatee not named in the will—Duty on such legacy.—By her will a testator gave a number of legacies, and directed that "all the legacies and bequests given by this my will be paid and given free of all deduction for legacy or other duty." By codicil she said: "I give and bequeath the following legacies in addition to those named in my will." Then followed a number of legacies to legatees of the will, and this legacy to a legatee not named in the will, and she added the words, "given in addition to those already bequeathed."

Held, that the legacy to the legatee not named in the will was also free of duty.

27. Construction—Power superadded to a life interest—Insufficiency of income—"To use as she may deem expedient"—Practice—Representation by separate counsel.—Where a testator gave the income of his estate to his wife for her life with remainder to residuary legatees, but directed that "in case such income shall not be sufficient, she is to use such portion of my said real and personal estate as she may deem expedient."

Held, that she had a general power of appointment during her life over the capital.

In re Pedrotti's Will, 27 Beav. 583, 8 W. R. Ch. Dig. 100, distinguished.—RICHARDS, RE, UGLOW v. RICHARDS, Ch.D. Farwell, J., 90; [1902] 1 Ch. 76; 71 L. J. Ch. 66; 85 L. T. 452.

28. Construction—Secret trust.—A testator built a museum and laid out pleasure grounds on a part of his estate, to which he admitted the public free, but carefully guarded against the public acquiring any right in respect thereof. By his will he devised his real estate, including the museum and grounds, to his first and other sons successively for life and in tail male. By a codicil to his will he devised the museum and grounds, with £300 per annum for their maintenance, to his eldest son and his heirs male, and also appointed two trustees for the purposes only of the museum and grounds. Evidence showed that the testator wished that his son should maintain the museum and grounds as in his lifetime, but that the public should acquire no rights therein, and that the son accepted the gift on these terms.

Held, that the intention of the testator having been that the public should acquire no rights, it was impossible to say that an effectual trust had been created binding on the son which could be enforced against him in favour of the public.

Decision of Kekewich, J. (49 W. R. 425, [1901] 1 Ch. 352), reversed.—PITT-RIVERS, RE, SCOTT v. PITT-RIVERS, C.A., 342; [1902] 1 Ch. 403; 71 L. J. Ch. 225; 86 L. T. 6.

29. Construction—Shifting Clause—Exception of eldest son entitled to other estates.—Testator devised his real estates to the use of his nephew for life, with remainder to all and every the son and sons of the nephew born in the testator's lifetime, or in due time afterwards ("other than and except an eldest or only son for the time being entitled to the possession or to the receipt of the rents issues and profits of certain estates" situate at C. "after the decease" of the nephew, "as tenant for life or any greater estate or interest whatsoever"), severally and successively in remainder, one after another for their respective lives. The nephew's eldest son, who was tenant in tail of the C. estates in remainder expectant on the death of his father, joined with his father in disentailing them. They were sold, and the proceeds of sale settled upon trusts, in which the eldest son took some benefit. He subsequently became bankrupt, and his interest in the proceeds was sold.

Held, that on the nephew's death his eldest son was not within the exception, and was entitled to the first life interest, after his father's death, in the estates devised by the testator's will.—LAW UNION AND CROWN INSURANCE CO. v. HILL, H.L.; [1902] A. C. 263; 71 L. J. Ch. 602; 86 L. T. 773.

30. Debts—Simple direction to pay debts—Executor according to the tenor.—A simple direction to a certain person to pay debts of the testatrix, without any bequest to him and without specifically appointing him as trustee, may be enough to constitute him executor according to the tenor.

A testatrix, after bequeathing certain pecuniary legacies, desired J. G. to pay all her just debts, and then bequeathed to her niece, P. M., all her furniture and effects and all money she possessed.

Held, that J. G. was thereby constituted executor according to the tenor.—COOK. IN THE GOODS OF, P.D. & Ad.D.; [1902] P. 114; 71 L. J. P. 49; 86 L. T. 537.

31. Execution—Attestation—"In the presence of the testator"—Wills Act, 1837 (1 Vict. c. 26), s. 9.—A testator signed his will in his bedroom and the attesting witnesses added their signatures in the adjoining dressing-room, the door between the two rooms being open at the time. On its being shown that the testator could not have had the witnesses in sight when they attested the will, it was held that the will was not duly executed.—CARTER v. SEATON, P.D. & Ad.D.; 85 L. T. 76.

32. Execution—"In the presence" of witnesses—Wills Act, 1837 (1 Vict. c. 26), s. 9.—The expression "in the presence" in section 9 of the Wills Act must be taken to mean actual visual presence.

When a testatrix signed her will in a shop, and one witness, who saw her sign, attested it, but the other witness being at the time when the testatrix and first witness signed engaged at the other side of the shop with a person who stood between him and the testatrix, did not see them sign and did not know nor have the opportunity of knowing anything about what they had been engaged upon until after they had signed, when he was asked to be a witness.

Held, that the testatrix did not sign "in the presence" of the second witness.—BROWN v. SKIRROW, P.D. & Ad.D.; [1902] P. 3; 71 L. J. P. 91; 85 L. T. 645.

33. Execution — Knowledge and approval by testator—Presumption of law—Will read over by testator of sound mind, &c.—Words inserted by mistake of solicitor.—Although a will may have been read by or read over to a testator of sound mind, memory, and understanding, and in every way competent to comprehend the purport of it, it is nevertheless competent to the court to hold that it was not properly read by or read over to the testator, and that he did not know and approve of its contents, if, on the consideration of all the facts and special circumstances of the case, the court should be of opinion that it ought to do so.

34. Executor—"Administer"—Executor according to the tenor—Construction of will.—A testator, by his will, appointed H. E. "to hold and administer in trust all my estate well known to the said H. E."

Held, that as this person had duties to perform, the word "administer" was, without any express instruction to pay debts, sufficient to constitute him executor according to the tenor.—WAY, IN THE GOODS OF, P.D. & Ad.D.; [1901] P. 345; 71 L. J. P. 13; 85 L. T. 643.

35. Ground-rents — Trustee — Tenant for life—Remaindermen—Interest of all persons entitled under settlement—Possession—Collection—Sale—Payment off of incumbrances—Title deeds—Custody.—A testator gave his annual ground-rents, secured on two estates, to trustees upon trust to collect and apply the same in reduction of a mortgage debt thereon, and subject thereto upon trust as to two-fifths of the annual income for J. for life, as to the other two-fifths for P. for life, and as to the remaining one-fifth for L. for life. And he directed that on the decease of either J., P., or L. his or her share of the ground-rents should go to his or her children. And the testator empowered his trustees to sell the ground-rents, pay off the mortgage debt, invest the residuary proceeds of sale, and stand possessed thereof upon the trusts declared respecting the annual ground-rents should they remain unsold. The testator died in 1891. J. had three, and P. one, infant children entitled to the ground-rents in remainder. The trustees considered it advisable in the interest of all the beneficiaries to retain the ground-rents and apply the income in reduction of the mortgage debt thereon, which by January, 1901, was reduced to less than half. The mortgage debt became vested in the surviving trustee of the will. Upon a summons taken out by the tenants for life against the surviving trustee and infant remaindermen, Held, that the tenants for life were entitled to immediate possession of the ground-rents and to sell them to pay off the mortgage debt and also to delivery up of the documents of title held by the surviving trustee, as trustee relating to the ground-rents.—RE WILKINSON, LLOYD v. STEEL, Ch.D. Cozens-Hardy, J.; 85 L. T. 43.

36. Legacy for charitable purposes agreed upon—Admissibility of evidence.—A testatrix bequeathed £4,000 to C. "for the charitable purposes agreed upon between us."

Held, that there was a limited charitable purpose, and that evidence was admissible to show what were the terms agreed upon.

In re Fleetwood, 29 W. R. 45, 15 Ch. D. 594, followed.—HUXTABLE, RE, HUXTABLE v. CRAWFURD, Ch.D. Farwell, J., 185; [1902] 1 Ch. 214; 71 L. J. Ch. 168; 85 L. T. 516.

37. Maintenance—Residue to individuals in shares—Gift of income for maintenance of all—Vested or contingent.—Where a testator gives residue to several persons on their attaining twenty-one in equal shares and directs the income during their respective minorities to be applied for the maintenance of all indiscriminately, the gift will not be vested; sicus, if the direction be to apply the income of the respective shares of each for his or her maintenance.

38. Remoteness—Gift over—Splitting gif over—Cutting down absolute gift.—A testator, who died in 1852, gave his residuary personal estate to trustees in trust for his wife (who died in 1876) for life, and after her death he allotted two-fifths to S. D., and he directed that the two-fifths so given should remain in trust for her during her life for her separate use, and after her death in trust for her children, who being sons should attain twenty-five, or being a daughter or daughters should attain twenty-one or marry under that age, and in default of any such issue should be divided among the children of his brother C.

S. D. died in 1899 without ever having any issue.

Held, that the gift over on the death of S. D. without issue was void for remoteness, and that as the gift over failed, the original absolute gift took effect, and the two-fifths passed therefore to S. D.'s personal representatives.

Evers v. Challis, 7 H. L. Cas. 531, distinguished.

Decision of the Court of Appeal ([1901] 1 Ch. 482, 49 W. R. Dig. 203) affirmed.

Where you have an absolute gift to a legatee in the first instance, and trusts are engrafted or imposed on that absolute interest which fail, either from lapse or invalidity, or any other reason, then the absolute gift takes effect, so far as the trusts have failed, to the exclusion of the residuary legatee or next-of-kin, as the case may be.—HANCOCK v. WATSON, H.L., 321; [1902] A. C. 14; 71 L. J. Ch. 149; 85 L. T. 729.

39. Remoteness—Restraint on anticipation—Separability of class.—A restraint on anticipation imposed by will on a class of females is valid as regards members of the class born in the testator's lifetime, though void for remoteness as regards those born afterwards.

Herbert v. Webster, 15 Ch. D. 610, 28 W. R. Dig. 197, followed.—FERNELEY'S ESTATE, RE, Ch D. Swinfen Eady, J., 346; [1902] 1 Ch. 543; 71 L. J. Ch. 422; 86 L. T. 413.

40. Satisfaction—Bequest of legacies to several persons of sums equal to debts secured by promissory notes—Time for payment of legacies.—Pecuniary legacies which by the express terms of the will were not payable until a period of four years after testator's decease are not a satisfaction for debts of equal amount secured to the legatees by a negotiable instrument made by the testator.—ROBERTS, RE, ROBERTS v. PARRY, Ch.D. Byrne, J., 469.

41. Survivor—Legatee entitled to share on surviving testator—Disappearance in testator's lifetime—No evidence of death—Presumption—Onus probandi.—In September, 1892, P., who was then twenty-four years of age and employed as a commercial traveller, suddenly disappeared, his accounts showing that he was in default to his employers, and he had never since been heard of. Under his father's will he was entitled to a share of the residuary estate in the event of his surviving the testator. The testator died in June, 1893. Upon a summons taken out by the trustees in 1900 to have it determined how P.'s share ought to be dealt with:—

Held, that P. must be presumed to be dead, and, in the absence of proof that he had survived the testator, the court, without making any declaration as to the date of P.'s death, gave the trustees liberty to distribute his share on the footing that he had predeceased the testator.—BENJAMIN, RE, NEVILLE v. BENJAMIN, *Ch.D.
